LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. I agree with your Lordship that there was a compromise arrived at here, and it appears to have been of this sort—the matter was brought before the general body of creditors, and the arrangement come to by the trustee was approved of. Now, if an arrangement by the trustee has been deliberately approved of, it will not help the matter to a proper conclusion if we sanction a demand by an individual creditor to be allowed to act contrary to the resolution of the general body of creditors by suing a particular claim. I think therefore the decision of the Lord Ordinary is sound.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion. The case is one in which a com-

In such cases the Court will refuse to confirm such a resolution, when appealed against by a complaining creditor, where it appears that the creditors are sacrificing the estate in any way, e.g., by taking a small sum in discharge of a large claim with nothing clearly to justify this being done. But then, I take it that the person who proposes to get the use of the trustee's name in order to enable him to challenge the resolution or transaction must undertake to keep the bankrupt estate secure against loss—must insure that the estate shall not lose any advantage it may have gained by a compromise.

There was a question between Captain Edward Campbell and the trustee. The former claimed to be entitled to retain the whole sum paid to him by Messrs Cox & Company, and the trustee agreed that if he was paid the sum of £241, 5s. 7d. he would undertake not to go back upon the payments made by Captain Campbell to other creditors. The matter was thus compromised. The proposal of the appellants now is to reopen the whole question, and if they succeed there might arise a loss to the trust-estate, because it is quite clear that if the compromise is held to be ineffectual the trustee must repay this sum of £241, 5s. 7d. I agree with the Lord Ordinary where he says,—“It is enough for the present purpose that by the settlement in question the bankrupt estate obtains payment of a sum of £241, 5s. 7d., to which, according to Captain Campbell's contention, they were not entitled, and which if the question were reopened, as the appellants propose, might ultimately be lost to the estate.” The appellants cannot dispute that this may be the ultimate result of the proceedings which they propose to take. I think that this resolution is not one of the class with which the Court will, in the circumstances, interfere, and I am therefore for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD ADAM.—I concur, and I think that the Lord Ordinary has put the case exactly upon the right grounds. The case was one of compromise, and that being so, the resolution appealed against ought not to be disturbed.

If the appellants had, at the meeting of creditors, offered to keep the trust-estate indemnus from loss and the costs of the action they proposed to raise in the trustee's name, and if this offer had been refused, that would have raised a different question. But we have none such here, and I think, therefore, that we ought to adhere.

Nelson v.
Assets Co.,

Lord Kinnear.
M.

ON 6th December 1886 William Logan, house-factor, Glasgow, wrote the following letter to W. D. Husband, submanager of the Assets Company, Limited, Edinburgh:—"Dear Sir,—I hereby offer to purchase the following parts of the tenement at the south-west corner of the entrance from Argyle Street to St Enoch Square, known as His Lordship's Larder, namely, the top storey, with all the garret storey, except (a) garret room, ten feet square, in middle or nepos of storey; and (b) middle garret room with skylight; also four cellars north of Hunter's, except the eastmost back sunk cellar, with free ish and entry by the common close on the north to Argyle Street, and with a common right along with the other proprietors to the court behind, with entry from Adam's Court Lane. The price to be £3000 sterling, and to be paid at Whitsunday next, 1887, when I am to have entry, free of leases, . . . . . You are to allow £2000 of the price to lie on bond at 4½ per cent for five years from date of entry. Your acceptance will oblige." On 9th December Mr Husband sent in reply the following letter:—"Dear Sir,—As authorised by the directors, and on behalf of this company, I hereby accept your offer, as copied on the other side, dated 6th instant, of £3000 (three thousand pounds) for our interest in the property known as 'His Lordship's Larder,' St Enoch Square."

This action was raised by James Nelson, tobacco manufacturer, Greenock, to whom Mr Logan had sold and assigned his whole right, title, and interest in the subjects of the above offer and acceptance. The pursuer sought to have the company ordained to implement their part of the alleged contract, and to deliver up a valid disposition to the subjects contained in the offer and acceptance. The pursuer further sought to have the defenders ordained to pay £2000 damages in the event of failure to implement the contract.

The pursuer averred, and the defenders admitted, that from the progress of titles submitted to Logan's agent, in order that his agents might prepare a disposition in his favour, it appeared that the defenders had no title to one of the cellars sold, nor to the court behind the subjects, and no title to ish and entry by the common close on the north to Argyle Street, or by the entry from Adam's Court Lane. The pursuer further averred that the defenders had failed when called upon to clear the title or to grant a disposition with warrandice, and that he had suffered damage to the extent of £250 through their delay, which prevented his carrying out arrangements made with a purchaser to give possession of the subjects at Whitsunday 1887.

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) The defenders having contracted to sell to the pursuer's cedent the subjects enumerated in the contract of sale, they are bound to grant in the pursuer's favour a valid disposition thereof. (2) The defenders having failed to produce a valid progress of titles to the whole subjects sold, and having refused to grant a disposition of the said subjects with warrandice, they are liable in damages.

The defenders pleaded;—(2) In terms of said acceptance, the defenders were only bound to convey the property as it stood in their persons, and having offered a conveyance in said terms, they should be assolized. (3) Separatim. There having been no consensus in idem placitum et conventio, the defenders are entitled to absolvitor.

On 14th December 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Finds that the letters specified in the condescendence do not constitute a completed contract for the purchase and sale of the subjects described in the conclusions of the summons: Therefore assolizies the defenders from the conclusions of the summons, and decerns," &c.*

* "OPINION.—This action is brought to enforce performance of a contract for the purchase and sale of a portion of a house or tenement of houses in Glasgow, and the question is whether letters passing between the parties constitute a concluded contract to that effect.

"The pursuer is not a party to the correspondence, but the assignee of William Logan, house-factor in Glasgow, who writes to the defenders' manager a letter, dated 6th December 1886, containing the offer which is said to have been accepted. The pursuer alleges that at that date the writer of the letter had not examined the title-deeds of the property in question, but, without reference to the titles, his letter contains a sufficiently clear and specific description of the subjects which he proposes to buy. 'I hereby offer to purchase the following parts of the tenement at the south-west corner of the entrance from Argyle Street to St Enoch Square, known as His Lordship's Larder, namely, the top storey, with all the garret storey except (a) garret room, ten feet square, in middle or nepos of storey; and (b) middle garret room with skylight; also four cellars north of Hunter's, except the eastmost back sunk cellar, with free ish and entry by the common close on the north to Argyle Street, and with a common right along with the other proprietors to the court behind, with entry from Adam's Court Lane. The price to be £3000 sterling, and to be paid at Whitsunday next 1887, when I am to have entry, free of leases, with the exception of Costigane Brothers, as to which I am to have possession six months after the date of your acceptance hereof. You are to allow £2000 of the price to lie on bond at 4½ per cent for five years from date of entry. Your acceptance will oblige.' On the 9th of December Mr Husband, the defenders' manager, answers in these terms:—'As authorised by the directors, and on behalf of this company, I hereby accept your offer, as copied on the other side, dated 6th instant, of £3000 for our interest in the property known as "His Lordship's Larder," St Enoch Square, and in accordance with your stipulation as to the close 179 Argyle Street, leased to Messrs Costigane Brothers, I have given notice to the lessees that possession is required in terms of articles 1st and 3d of the relative minute of agreement and lease.'

"Now, if the defenders' right of property in the tenement known as 'His Lordship's Larder' had corresponded exactly with the description in Mr Logan's offer, there would probably have been no question as to the meaning and effect of these missives. But it turns out, according to the pursuer's averment, that they have no title, and by their own admission that they have no clear and undisputed title to certain portions of the subjects, viz., one of the cellars, the court behind the subjects, and the rights to ish and entry specially described. The defenders cannot convey to the pursuer rights which they do not themselves possess. But, on the other hand, it is clear enough, first, that the pursuer cannot be required to accept a conveyance which will be ineffectual to carry any part of the subjects specifically described in the offer; and secondly, that if the defenders have in fact contracted to sell and convey the whole of these subjects, they will not be excused from the consequences of wilful non-performance by reason of any defect in their own right or title. But I am of opinion that they have made no such contract. The defenders' manager does not accept the offer in the exact terms in which it is made, but accepts it as an offer for 'our interest' in the property described, and that appears to me to introduce into the acceptance a qualification which was not in the offer. It is a qualification which it was very natural to make in the circumstances, because the state of possession was such as to render it not improbable that questions might arise as to the exact import and bearing of the title. It was very natural, therefore, that the defenders should introduce a term into their acceptance which would serve to exclude from the bargain, if the purchaser agreed to it, any part of the property which did not belong to them, or in which they had no interest. I think the words they have used are sufficient for that purpose, and it follows that their letter is not an absolute and unequivocal acceptance which would

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued;—The offer was perfectly clear and unambiguous in its terms, and the same was true of the acceptance. The latter referred to the former as “copied on the other side,” importing an absolute agreement to buy the subjects therein described. The Lord Ordinary had viewed the acceptance as a counter proposal which the pursuer was not bound to accept. If the defenders intended that their acceptance should be of this nature, they ought to have called Mr Logan’s attention more definitely to it.<sup>1</sup>

Argued for the defenders;—The Lord Ordinary had taken a sound view of the transaction alleged to be carried out by the missives. The acceptance was simply one with a qualification. If the pursuer’s argument was sound then the words “our interest” were pleonastic. If the defenders had meant to accept the pursuer’s offer in terms, then they would have merely said “we accept your offer.” The qualification of “our interest” was a perfectly natural one to make, because the state of possession was such as to render it not improbable that questions might arise as to the exact import of the title. The English case relied upon by the pursuer was not in point, because in it there was no introduction of a totally new term of contract as there was here. There was here no consensus in idem, and therefore no completed contract of sale.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer seeks to have the defenders ordained to deliver to him a valid disposition of the subjects described in the summons. The demand is made in these circumstances. Mr Logan, a house-factor, in whose right the pursuer is, wrote a letter, on 6th December 1886, to the Assets Company in which he offered to purchase certain parts of the tenement at the south-west corner of the entrance from Argyle Street to St Enoch Square, these make the contract complete, but a counter proposal which the maker of the offer was not bound to accept, and which he has not in fact accepted. There is therefore no contract, because it is very clear in law that no contract can be constituted by missive letters, unless the letters contain an absolute and unqualified acceptance on the one part of the exact terms proposed on the other part.

“It is said that, inasmuch as it refers to the offer as ‘copied on the other side,’ the defenders’ letter must be held to import an absolute agreement to sell the subject specifically described, irrespective of any question as to their own right or title. I cannot assent to that construction, because it makes the words ‘for our interest’ unmeaning. The reference to the offer makes it clear enough that the parties were substantially at one as to the subject-matter of the proposed contract; but it does not, in my judgment, import a guarantee that every part of the description is exactly accurate, and the qualifying words which immediately follow are sufficient to shew that no such guarantee was intended. But assuming that the construction of the defenders’ letter is not so clear as they suppose, it is at least ambiguous, and the pursuer’s understanding of its terms is different from that of the defenders. But if that be so, there is no contract, because there is no consensus in idem.”

“The cases of Robertson v. Rutherford (July 18, 1840, 2 D. 1494, 12 Scot. Jur. 672), and Whyte v. Lee (Feb. 22, 1879, 6 R. 699), on which the pursuer relies, do not appear to me to support his argument. But they are not directly in point, because the only question in this case is whether the language employed by the defenders in their letter imports an unqualified acceptance of the terms proposed to them; and that is a mere question of construction, upon which there is no light to be derived from decisions as to the interpretation of other documents in different terms.”

No. 162. parts being described in detail. He named a price, and there were certain other stipulations in the offer, which are of no importance in the consideration of the case. The answer to this offer was in these terms, and was written by the sub-manager of the company:—"As authorised by the directors, and on behalf of this company, I hereby accept your offer, as copied on the other side, dated 6th instant, of £3000 for our interest in the property known as 'His Lordship's Larder,' St Enoch Square."

July 3, 1889.
Nelson v.

Now, the pursuer asks that this acceptance should be read as if it had run thus:—"We accept your offer for our interest as described by you," for unless the acceptance is exactly for the subjects the pursuer offered for, there can be no valid acceptance.

I am unable to adopt this reading. I read the letter of the company as it has been read by the Lord Ordinary. I think the acceptance was one simply for the defenders' "interest" in the property, whatever that might be. I cannot read it as an acceptance by the Assets Company by which they accepted the pursuer's offer to purchase all the subjects described in the letter of the 6th December. There was no completed sale, the acceptance not corresponding with the offer. Further writing would have been necessary to complete a bargain. I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is right.

2D DIVISION.
M.

MRS MARY MITCHELL died at Largs, Ayrshire, on 19th February 1888, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 2d August 1884, and codicil, dated 14th October 1885. By the settlement she conveyed her whole estate to trustees, for certain purposes. By the fourth purpose she directed the trustees "to assign and transfer to my niece, Anne Jane Barbour, the shares standing in my name in the Paisley Gas Company."

Before the date of Mrs Mitchell's will the Paisley Gas Company had ceased to exist, and the interests of the shareholders had been converted into annuities payable by the corporation of Paisley, and before her death the corporation had redeemed her annuities, and at the date of her death she held a mortgage for the price, £320, from the Magistrates of Paisley, executed under the Paisley Corporation Gas Act, 1870. A question arose between the trustees and Anne Jane Barbour (who had married a Mr Fergus) as to whether the latter was entitled, as the subject of the legacy, to the mortgage of £320. This special case, to which the trustees were first parties, and Mrs Fergus was second party, was stated to have the question determined.

Mitchell's

Trustees v.

Fergus.

The following were the material facts:—By the Paisley Corporation Gas Act, 1870 (33 and 34 Vict. cap. xxxv.) the power of supplying gas for the town of Paisley was placed in the hands of the corporation of Paisley, and the corporation were required to pay to the shareholders of the Paisley Gas Company annuities at a certain rate on the amount paid upon their shares, and it was enacted that “all the shares of the company shall from and after the commencement of this Act be held to be extinguished.”

It was also enacted (sec. 23) that “the annuities shall in all respects be substituted for and represent shares in the capital of the company . . . and the annuities shall be conveyed or affected by any deed, will, or other instrument disposing of or affecting such shares.”

The Act further provided that the annuitants should be “creditors of the corporation for payment of the annuities respectively hereinbefore provided to be paid to them,” holding in security a mortgage over the lands and works vested in the corporation for the purposes of the Act.

It was also provided that the corporation might from time to time redeem the annuities on giving certain notices of their intention so to do.

At the passing of the Act of 1870 Mrs Mitchell's husband was owner of shares in the gas company to the nominal value of £150, and she was owner of shares to the nominal value of £50. After that Act they held the annuities into which these shares had been thereby converted. Mr Mitchell died in 1879, and Mrs Mitchell succeeded to his annuities, which were transferred to her name. She continued to hold both them and her original annuities at the date of her settlement in 1884.

In 1885 the corporation resolved to redeem the gas annuities, and gave the statutory notices of their intention. They also sent out a circular to the holders thereof, stating the sums of redemption money to which they were entitled (in Mrs Mitchell's case, £320), and offering to receive proposals for loans at 3½ per cent to replace a portion of the annuities. No correspondence took place between Mrs Mitchell or her agent and the corporation, but her agent arranged verbally with the treasurer of the corporation that she would lend the £320, and she received from the corporation a mortgage, dated 9th February 1886, repayable in 1891, in the terms quoted below.*

The question of law was,—“Is the party of the second part entitled to demand, and are the parties of the first part bound to assign and transfer to the second party the said mortgage for £320, or has the said legacy in favour of the said second party been adeemed, and does the amount thereof fall into residue?"

Argued for the first parties;—The legacy was a specific legacy of shares. It was adeemed by reason of the fact that the shares of which it consisted were transformed into annuities, and that these annuities had been bought up by the corporation. The deceased had been offered, and must be taken to have received, cash for her shares, or rather for the annuities into which they had been converted. She had lent that money to the corporation. It formed a substantially different thing from the subject of the original bequest. The loan was a purely voluntary loan on her part. It could not therefore be said that the only thing which had occurred to affect the legacy was due to a supervening cause quite apart from the testator's will.<sup>1</sup>

Argued for the second party;—The question was whether the subject of the legacy was not throughout substantially the same.<sup>2</sup> The state of fact was that the will itself did not use accurate language. In 1884, when it was made, the testatrix had no gas shares. She had already become a creditor for an annuity instead of a holder of shares. Her intention was quite clear. After the date of her will the annuities were redeemed, but the price just represented them, and was allowed to remain with the same debtor on the security of the same undertaking.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This case raises a question of some difficulty. The late Mrs Mitchell had at one time some shares in the Paisley Gas Company. Her husband also had some shares of the same company. These shares were, under an Act by which the Paisley Gas Commissioners took over the gas works from the old company, converted into annuities. She on her husband's death succeeded to his interest in these annuities. Having thus certain gas annuities, Mrs Mitchell, by the fourth purpose of her settlement, dated in 1884, directed her trustees "to assign and transfer to my niece, Anne Jane Barbour, the shares standing in my name in the Paisley Gas Company." Now, in 1884, she had no shares in any Paisley Gas Company, there being no Paisley Gas Company then in existence, and the shares having been converted into annuities.

A further complication took place between the date of the settlement in 1884 and the death of Mrs Mitchell in 1888. In the beginning of 1885 the corporation of Paisley, under powers contained in the Gas Act known as the Paisley Corporation Gas Act, resolved to redeem the gas annuities, and Mrs Mitchell's annuities thus ceased to exist. The corporation were willing that the sum for which they were to be liable as the redemption price of the annuities should be taken in loan by them at 3½ per cent, and accordingly the price of Mrs Mitchell's interest in the annuities, instead of being repaid to her, became, under an arrangement made for her by her agent, a loan to the corporation by her. That loan was in existence when she died.

Now, it appears to be the fact that Mrs Mitchell herself knew little about how the matter stood. There was no correspondence about it, and her agent made a verbal arrangement with the treasurer of the corporation as to the loan. She seems, at the date of her will in 1884, to have had no idea that the shares had been changed into annuities, and there is no reason to suppose that after 1884 she knew that the annuities had been changed into a loan. She probably received her return, whether of dividend, annuity, or interest, without troubling herself as to the form of her security.

Now, the settlement she left requires construction. She had no asset such as "shares in the Paisley Gas Company." But when we look at her estate we find that she had a sum invested in a gas undertaking belonging to Paisley at the time she made the settlement, and at the time of her death, when the settlement came into operation, the annuities had become a loan. There is no doubt that the sum in the loan is the sum which had been represented by annuities, and before that by shares. This therefore is certainly not the usual case of ademption of a legacy. In such a case there is a specific thing which is the subject of the legacy, and the bequest of it falls in consequence of the testator dealing with it so as to nullify the gift. For example, if a picture is the subject, the testator may have sold it or given it away during his life, or if shares form the subject, he may have turned them into money during his own life. But here the case is very different. There has been no action on the part of the testatrix indicating her intention to convert the subject into something else, or to deal with it in any way so as to bring the bequest to an end. She left her money where it was. No doubt the form of the investment was changed, but the case lacks the essential feature of ademption—the conversion of the subject so as to indicate an intention to depart from the previously evinced desire that a particular thing should go to a particular individual. It is to be observed, indeed, that none of the changes which were made were voluntarily made by herself. Each was enforced by the exercise of a right on the part of another, in one case a right to redeem, in the other a right to convert into an annuity. But for these various exercises of that power, which Mrs Mitchell had nothing to do with, it is plain that no change in the subject would have taken place. Mrs Mitchell knew that her money was invested in a gas undertaking. The form of the investment, however, did not influence her. She wished the money which was invested in that way to go to her niece. There is no difficulty in identifying the sum. It is the only sum to which she can refer. I am of opinion that the conversion of it into a loan to the corporation did not extinguish the legacy. We are, I think, entitled to consider all the circumstances, and I think no change of the intention that the money was to go to her niece can be inferred. I am therefore of opinion that we ought to find that the trustees must transfer to the niece the mortgage for £320.

LORD YOUNG.—I concur. The legacy is one of "shares standing in my name in the Paisley Gas Company." Now, that was an inaccurate description at the date of the will itself. But it is not doubtful what was intended, and I am of opinion that the will, notwithstanding that inaccuracy, was effectual to carry out that intention. The language was still more inaccurate at the date Mrs Mitchell died, for the change from annuities into a loan had taken place. But I think that the intention is sufficiently indicated to warrant, indeed to compel, the trustees to give effect to it. On the facts of the case, without departing from the principle of ademption at all, I am of opinion that the legacy was not adeemed, and that the legatee is entitled to it.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I regret that I cannot concur in the judgment which your Lordship proposes. It is very likely that the testator intended that the party of the second part should take the money which is in question. But I do not think that we are entitled to proceed on any such conjecture, however probable.

 Trustees v.
 Fergus.

The trustees are directed to transfer to Anne Jane Barbour the shares standing in the testator's name in the Paisley Gas Company. At her death the testator had no shares in that company, which, under an Act passed in 1870, had been acquired by the corporation of Paisley. But she was creditor in a mortgage for £320 over the undertaking belonging to the corporation. The money so invested was the proceeds of an annuity which she had previously held from the corporation, being the statutory equivalent which she received and was bound to receive for her shares in the gas company.

The 23d section of the Act by which the shares were converted into annuities declares that "the annuities shall in all respects be substituted for and represent shares in the capital of the company, . . . and the annuities shall be conveyed or affected by any deed, will, or other instrument disposing of or affecting such shares."

The testator's will was made after her shares had been converted into an annuity. I am willing to assume that the direction to transfer the shares would have been sufficient to dispose of the annuity. But to my mind this does not furnish a solution of the question before us. The annuity represents the shares, but there is no similar statutory declaration applicable to the mortgage.

The corporation of Paisley had a statutory power to redeem the annuities which they had granted under the Act of 1870, and they exercised that power. It was in the option of the testator to require payment of the redemption money or to take a mortgage over the undertaking. She chose the latter alternative.

If she had taken payment I conceive it to be clear that the legacy would have been adeemed, because the subject of it would have ceased to exist. I see no reason to doubt that the same result would have followed if she had invested the money in another security. The fact that the money so invested could be shewn to be the produce of the gas shares or of the annuity would not avail to preserve the legacy, for the simple reason that a bequest of the testator's gas shares could pass nothing but the shares themselves or their statutory equivalent. In my opinion, a legacy of the shares will not pass the produce of the shares, or any security on which that produce may be invested, unless there be some statutory enactment applicable to such produce or security similar to that which I have quoted regarding the annuity. For the same reason I think that the bequest which we are now considering cannot transfer the mortgage held by the testator over the undertaking belonging to the Paisley corporation. That mortgage is neither gas shares, nor has it been declared to be a statutory representative or equivalent for gas shares. It is nothing more than a security which the testator chose to take. When she parted with her shares, or rather with the annuity which was the equivalent of these shares, the subject of the legacy perished, and therefore in my opinion the legacy is adeemed.

LORD LEE.—The question in this case arises upon a direction in the trust settlement of the late Mrs Mary Barbour or Mitchell "to assign and transfer to my niece, Anne Jane Barbour, the shares standing in my name in the Paisley Gas Company."

It appears that at the date of her settlement (2d August 1884) there were no "shares" in the gas company standing in the testator's name. The Act of 1870, narrated in the case, had extinguished the shares, and substituted certain annuities. These were declared to be conveyed or affected by any deed or will disposing of or affecting such shares. But strictly speaking, there was nothing standing in the name of shares in Mrs Mitchell's name. She was merely a creditor in a gas annuity due by the corporation. No. 163.

July 3, 1889.
Mitchell's
Trustees v.
Fergus.

The question is whether the subsequent redemption of this annuity in January 1886 under another clause of the same statute, and in terms of a circular issued by the corporation proposing to allow the redemption money to be invested as a loan secured upon "the several rents, charges, and revenues (except the gas guarantee rate) accruing to the corporation from the lands, property, and works vested in them under the authority of the said Act,"—viz., the Act under which the corporation acquired the gasworks and gas undertaking—together with the testator's acceptance of that proposal—so completely extinguished the subject of the bequest, that the legacy must be held to have been adeemed?

I have no doubt of the general rule of law that if the subject of the bequest ceases to exist, the legacy is at an end by ademption. This may occur in many cases even without evidence of intention.

I think that in this case the question of ademption depends upon the intention of the testator. For unless it can be made clear that the subject of the bequest, as viewed by her, was brought to an end, there is no ademption.

The testator's position at the time of her bequest was that of a creditor of the corporation for an annuity secured upon the gas undertaking, and the only change which was effected was that she became in respect of her right to the redemption money a creditor in a loan for the capital value of the annuity secured in the same way.

It was not a change from the position of shareholder into that of creditor. Nor was it from the position of creditor to that of shareholder. And on the whole, I think that the continuity of the subject of the bequest was sufficiently preserved to entitle the legatee, in the absence of any indication of intention to the contrary, to claim the testator's interest in the Gas Corporation loan, as representing the annuity, which was declared to be affectable by any deed or will disposing of the original shares.

I am of opinion, therefore, that the legacy was not adeemed, and that the Court should answer the first part of the question stated in this case in the affirmative.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords are of opinion that the party of the second part is entitled to demand, and that the parties of the first part are bound to assign and transfer to the second party the mortgage for £320."

afterwards, assigned the policies by assignation ex facie absolute to the creditor to whom the guarantee was to be delivered. In an action raised against the father by the creditor to enforce the obligation for payment of the premiums, held that as the document founded on was not tested or holograph the onus lay upon the pursuer to prove that the defender had authorised the obligation to pay the premiums to be inserted above his signature, and that the pursuer had failed to prove such authority.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Kirkcudbright.

I.

WYLIE & LOCHHEAD, Limited, furniture-dealers, Glasgow, raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Kirkcudbright, in July 1887 against James Hornsby senior, builder, Gatehouse, for payment of £47, 7s. 11d., being the amount of premiums of insurance paid by them in keeping up two policies of assurance on the life of James Hornsby junior, the defender's son, payment of which premiums they alleged to have been guaranteed by the defender. They also concluded that the defender should be ordained to relieve them of payment of future premiums.

The pursuers stated that James Hornsby junior had, on 3d February 1874, assigned to John Wylie, as sole and surviving partner of the late firm of Wylie & Lochhead, two policies of insurance for £300 and £500, and that by letter of guarantee produced by them, dated 31st January 1874, the defender had guaranteed payment of the premiums.

The letter of guarantee produced by the pursuers was not holograph or tested. It bore the signature of the defender across a sixpenny stamp, and was in these terms:—"Messrs Wylie & Lochhead. Gatehouse, 31st January 1874. Gentlemen,—I hereby guarantee payment of £500 s.g., by my son James Hornsby, of the Gairloch Hotel, and the payment of premiums of insurance on his policies with the Scottish Widows' Fund and Scottish Amicable Societies, assigned to your firm. But my liability under this guarantee will be reduced according to the amount of security furnished by Mr Robert Bell, brick-builder, or any other party you may accept in his stead."

The pursuers further averred that Wylie & Lochhead, Limited, incorporated on 20th August 1883, had acquired from Mr Wylie, sole partner of the firm of Wylie & Lochhead, by an agreement dated 13th August 1883 between Wylie and Wylie & Lochhead, Limited, the whole assets of the old firm and, inter alia, the right to the policies and to the letter of guarantee.

The defender denied that he had ever undertaken any obligation to the pursuers. He stated that he had undertaken along with another person to be security to the former firm of Wylie & Lochhead for his son to the extent of £500, and that he had signed a blank letter bearing a sixpenny stamp, which he had authorised his son to fill up as a guarantee for £500, and that the obligation to pay premiums of insurance had been inserted without his knowledge; that the £500 for which the defender became bound had been long since paid, and that the defender's responsibility for his son under said letter had entirely ceased.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The letter of guarantee in question was not granted to the pursuers, nor transferred to them with defender's consent, and they cannot found thereon. (2) The alleged obligation for premiums is subsidiary to payment of the sum of £500, and that sum being paid, the obligation falls therewith. (3) The letter, so far as consisting of an obligation to pay insurance premiums, is not the act of defender, and does not bind him.

On 2d December 1887 the Sheriff-substitute (Dickson) dismissed the action as irrelevant on the ground that the pursuers alleged that since the granting of the alleged guarantee to "Wylie & Lochhead" the assets of that firm had been transferred to Wylie & Lochhead, Limited, and that they did not aver that the defender consented to the letter of guarantee continuing in force, and that under section 7 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act the letter of guarantee was of no force in favour of the pursuers.*

No. 164.
July 3, 1889.
Wylie & Loch-
head, Limited,
v. Hornsby.

On appeal the Sheriff (Macpherson) adhered.

The pursuers appealed to the Court of Session. The Court, on 3d July 1888, recalled in hoc statu the interlocutors of the Sheriffs, and remitted to the Sheriff to allow a proof.

Proof was led. It was proved by the evidence of the defender himself and of his daughter, which was not contradicted, that, at the request of James Hornsby junior, he had, on 31st January 1874, signed a blank sheet of paper bearing a sixpenny stamp, and that he sent it blank to the office of Wylie & Lochhead addressed to James Hornsby junior, that he authorised him to fill it up with a cautionary obligation for £500, but gave no further authority. The defender was not even aware of the existence of insurance policies belonging to his son.

It was proved that on 3d February 1874 James Hornsby junior had assigned to Mr John Wylie, sole partner of Wylie & Lochhead, the two policies on his life. The assignation was ex facie absolute. It contained no obligation on the granter to keep the policies in force by paying the premiums.

In 1879 the defender being communicated with by Wylie & Lochhead regarding the guarantee, repudiated his liability to make payment of insurance premiums, and stated that he had never heard of the insurances before. He then, having paid up more than £500 on behalf of his son, asked redelivery of any guarantees signed by him on behalf of his son, and an earlier guarantee than that in question was returned to him by Wylie & Lochhead. They refused to give him up that in question on the ground that it guaranteed the insurance premiums, and was still binding.

In 1883 Wylie, as sole partner of Wylie & Lochhead, transferred to Wylie & Lochhead, Limited, the whole property, plant, and assets of the firm.

In July 1887 John Wylie, designing himself as "formerly sole partner of Wylie & Lochhead," on the narrative that the policies were held by him in trust in connection with the contracts of the firm now carrying on business as Wylie & Lochhead, Limited, assigned to the pursuers the two policies.

James Hornsby junior became bankrupt in or about 1885. The premiums on the policies due in 1886 and 1887 were paid by the pursuers themselves, and amounted to the sum sued for, £47, 7s. 11d.

The Sheriff-Substitute (Dickson), on 20th March 1889, found "that the said James Hornsby junior came under no obligation to pay the premiums that should fall due after the date of the assignation to John Wylie:

* The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. cap. 60), enacts by sec. 7,—“No guarantee, security, cautionary obligation, or assurance granted or made after the passing of this Act to or for a company or firm consisting of two or more persons, or to or for a single person trading under the name of a firm, shall be binding on the granter or maker of the same in respect of anything done or omitted to be done after a change shall have taken place in any one or more of the partners of the company or firm to which the same has been granted or made, or of the company or firm for which the same has been granted or made, unless the intention of the parties that such guarantee, security, cautionary obligation, representation, or assurance shall continue to be binding, notwithstanding such change, shall appear by express stipulation or by necessary implication, from the nature of the firm, or otherwise.”

No. 164. Finds that there being no obligation upon James Hornsby junior to pay these premiums, there is no principal obligation to which the letter of guarantee (No. 3), so far as regards the payment of premiums, can apply, and that therefore no cautionary obligation was entered into by James Hornsby senior for payment of the premiums.

July 3, 1889.
Wylie & Loch-
head, Limited,
v. Hornsby.

On appeal the acting Sheriff (R. V. Campbell) adhered.

The pursuers appealed, and argued;—The obligation of the defender was really a primary obligation, not as the Sheriffs supposed an accessory one. The word “guarantee” was not equivalent to “caution,” and the obligation was to pay the premiums if called upon.

Argued for the defender;—The alleged obligation of the defender as to premiums was prior in date to the assignation of the policies, and was in no way connected with it. In order to its being a good guarantee there must be a valid principal obligation. But James Hornsby junior was not bound to pay the premiums.<sup>1</sup> There was further to be a co-cautioner, Mr Bell. But he did not sign, and therefore the defender was free.<sup>2</sup> It was proved that the defender had given his son no authority to fill up the paper sent to him with guarantee relating to premiums. Even if there was a guarantee, it was not assignable, and the pursuers had no title to sue.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—This action at the instance of Messrs Wylie & Lochhead is an action on a document by which the defender is said “to guarantee payment of £500 by my son James Hornsby of the Gairloch Hotel, and the payment of premiums of insurance on his policies with the Scottish Widows’ Fund and Scottish Amicable Societies assigned to your firm.” The action concludes for payment of £47, 7s. 11d. as premiums for the years 1886 and 1887 with interest, and that the pursuers be free and relieved in future of payment of premiums to become due. As to the premiums for prior years, between 1874 and 1886, we do not know how these were paid.

The pursuers aver that, in February 1874, the firm of Wylie & Lochhead as it then existed, Wylie being the sole partner, obtained from the defender’s son, James Hornsby junior, an assignation of two policies on his life. That assignation is printed in the print before us. It is an absolute unqualified assignation of two policies on the life of James Hornsby junior, and contains no statement that it is truly an assignation in security. But it is familiar in law that if a creditor obtains such an assignation truly as a security, though without any words to that effect, he may use it, according to the honest meaning of the transaction, as a security for his debt as it may exist at any time, whether at the date of the assignation or subsequently incurred. The pursuers’ case is that Wylie received this assignation as a security for the debt existing at its date or which might be incurred.

Now, when the case was first in Court, the Sheriff-substitute and Sheriff decided that the pursuers could not sue on this guarantee. They did so on the ground that Wylie & Lochhead are now a limited company registered under the Companies Acts, that the guarantee was not in their favour but in that of the sole partner of the old firm, and that it was therefore not available to the pursuers as a guarantee or cautionary obligation. It seems that John Wylie, the sole partner of the old firm, transferred to the new company, the pursuers, in 1884, the whole assets of the old firm of Wylie & Lochhead, and the pursuers rely upon that assignation, and the assignation of the policies by James Hornsby junior to Wylie in 1874. They say that any debt due to Wylie was transferred to the limited company, and that they are therefore now the creditors. They point also to a special assignation of the policies by John Wylie, formerly sole partner of Wylie & Lochhead, to the limited company, which is dated 28th July 1887, and their case is, that as creditors in the debt originally due to John Wylie and not yet paid, and as assignees of the policies, they are entitled to make them available for their security. Now, I think that is a sound view in law, and one which excludes that originally taken by the Sheriff, before we recalled his interlocutor, and allowed a proof.

No. 164.
July 3, 1889.
Wylie & Loch-
head, Limited,
v. Hornsby.

We have now the proof before us, and assuming the statutory difficulty to be out of the pursuers' way, I would point out that the alleged letter of guarantee is at the foundation of their case. That document is not holograph, nor is it probative. It requires to be proved. Now, there is conflicting evidence, or rather there are conflicting views of the evidence that has been led. The defender, the obligant ex facie of the letter, says distinctly that when he signed the paper on which the letter is he signed a blank paper having only a 6d. stamp on it. He says the paper with the stamp on it had been sent by his son to him for signature, and that he signed it. His daughter corroborates him.

[His Lordship read and examined the evidence of the defender and his daughter, to the effect that when the former signed across the stamp the paper was blank, and expressed the opinion that that evidence was true, and that it had been proved that the defender signed a blank paper on which the guarantee had been subsequently written.]

Now, I proceed to consider whether that writing of the letter of guarantee above the defender's signature was authorised. There are cases—the case of a signature on a bill-stamp is one of them, and there may be more—in which an authority is implied to place writing of an obligatory kind above a signature on a blank sheet of paper. If it is a bill-stamp, there is an authority implied to fill up a bill to any amount which the stamp will cover. But if a man puts his name to a blank paper with a 6d. stamp on it I know of no implied authority to write above it, and a party taking a document neither holograph nor probative must at all events prove not only the genuineness of the signature, but also that it was adhibited to the document as it stands, or that there was authority given to write over it what appears to have been written there. Here the part of the document sued on being the obligation to pay premiums on policies of insurance assigned to Wylie & Lochhead, the question is whether it is proved that the defender gave any authority to write over his signature such an obligation. Now, on this question the evidence is all one way. The defender says he gave none, had no idea that such would be written, and did not even know that his son's life was insured. Indeed, while the date put on the writing by Hornsby junior is 31st January 1874, there had then been no assignation of the policies, for the assignation of the policies is dated 3d February 1874, and the defender cannot therefore have known of such an assignation when he signed the blank paper. Now, is this a good obligation to Wylie & Lochhead, Limited, coming in right of Wylie, that the premiums will be paid? Were they entitled to rely on it as an obligation to pay the premiums on policies assigned on 3d February 1874, and to be held as a security for debt due and to become due? I am of opinion that it is not proved that the defender gave any authority to write such an obligation over his signature.

No. 164. James Hornsby junior, who might have given evidence on the point, is not a witness, and there is indeed nothing to shew that the defender gave such authority. It is a document that no careful man of business would have taken for such a purpose, and I must say I do not regret that the pursuers fail to shew it to be a good guarantee to them for the premiums in question.

July 3, 1889.
Wylie & Loch-
head, Limited,
v. Hornsby.

It is important to observe that the defender has for many years repudiated the obligation sought to be fixed upon him, and further, that though there was in 1883 a general conveyance by Wylie, as sole partner of the old firm, of its assets to the new company, there was no assignation of this document which had been repudiated. There was, indeed, the assignation of the policies in 1887 to the new company. One would have expected, however, an assignation of this alleged guarantee if Wylie had intended that it should belong to the new company.

I think the defender should be assolizied. I wish to add that had I been of opinion that there was authority to fill up the stamp as a guarantee, I could not have agreed in the finding of the Sheriffs "that there being no obligation upon James Hornsby junior to pay these premiums there is no principal obligation to which the letter of guarantee, so far as regards the payment of premiums can apply, and that therefore no cautionary obligation was entered into by James Hornsby senior." I think that is entirely erroneous.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I concur.

LORD LEE.—I agree in the opinion of Lord Young entirely. But I should have been disposed to go a step further, and to proceed upon a construction of the document different from that relied on by the defender. It appears to me to refer to an existing debt, and not to any general indebtedness in respect of advances made or to be made. It contains, so far as I see, nothing to warn the defender that his liability was to continue though the existing debt should be paid if Messrs Wylie & Lochhead should go on to make further advances to the defender's son.

In this view of the guarantee for £500, my opinion is that the guarantee for payment for premiums of insurance on the policies is limited to securing the then subsisting debt, and came to an end when it was paid.

It is true that the policies are mentioned as "assigned to your firm," and that the assignation, as between the principal debtor and his creditors, was ex facie absolute, and therefore enabled them, as against him, to hold the policies and pay the premiums, in security not only of the subsisting debt, but of further advances. The defender, however, is not affected, in my opinion, by the form of the assignation. For he was no party to it, and was not bound to know that it was other than an assignation in security of the subsisting debt. Indeed, it appears that the assignation was not granted till four days later than the date of the guarantee.

I am unable, therefore, to read the guarantee as continuing to bind the defender to pay premiums of insurance so long as any balance of £500 should remain due by the defender's son to Messrs Wylie & Lochhead, although, as appears from the accounts, the subsisting debt was extinguished by payments in cash.

The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THIS interlocutor was pronounced :—"Find in fact that the document No. 3 of process founded on by the pursuers is neither holograph nor tested, and was blank when signed by the defender, No. 164. and that the defender did not authorise the insertion therein of an obligation to pay the premiums of insurance upon the policies assigned by James Hornsby junior to John Wylie by assignation No. 13 of process: Find in law that the defender is not liable in payment to the pursuer of the premium of insurance specified in the account libelled."

July 3, 1889.
Christie's
Trustees v.
Murray's
Trustees.

Questions having arisen in regard to the rights of parties under the settlement, a special case was submitted to the Court by (1) the testator's testamentary trustees, (2) Mrs Murray's marriage-contract trustees, (3) Anthony Hugh Murray, Mrs Murray's only child, and his father, as his administrator-in-law, (4) Mrs Murray, (5) Mrs Rowland, and (6) Charles Robert Christie's curator bonis.

The questions of law were as follows:—"1. (a) Did the fee of the share of testator's estate bequeathed to his daughter Mrs Mary Agnes Christie or Murray vest in her a morte testatoris, and is the capital of it now payable by the first parties, General Christie's trustees, to the second parties as her marriage-contract trustees? 2. (a) Did the fee of the share bequeathed to the testator's daughter Mrs Hughina Margaret Christie or Rowland vest in her a morte testatoris, and are the first parties bound to pay the capital now to her? or (b) Are the first parties bound to hold the fee of this share? 3. (a) Did the fee of the share bequeathed to the testator's son Charles Robert Christie vest in him a morte testatoris? (b) Are the first parties bound to pay the capital thereof now to the party of the sixth part as his curator bonis? or (c) Are the first parties bound to retain the capital?"

Argued for the first parties;—The intention of the truster was that there should be a continuing trust. There was no direction to realise and pay. On the contrary, the money invested was not to be uplifted, but was to be left invested. The case might be regarded as falling either under the principle of Duthie's Trustees v. Kinloch,<sup>1</sup> in which case the children of the testator would have only a liferent, the fee being in their issue, or under that of Massy v. Scott's Trustees,<sup>2</sup> in which case, although the fee would be held to vest a morte in the testator's children, their issue would have a protected right of succession. It was not necessary to create a trust here. There was a trust in existence. Even if Mrs Murray were entitled to receive her share, the position of Mrs Rowland and Charles Robert Christie was different. The testator had declared that the trustees should "retain" their shares. That was conclusive of his intention, and such an intention might legally be given effect to.

Argued for the second and fourth parties;—Whatever might be said as to Mrs Rowland's share, there was no doubt that Mrs Murray's came to herself in fee, and therefore fell to be paid over to her marriage-contract trustees. There was no protected succession.<sup>3</sup> It was "to go direct to her and to her children." The destination to herself and her children was just a destination to herself. The clause beginning "failing the above mentioned" meant failing her without children in the testator's lifetime. Mrs Murray was in a more favourable position than Lady Massy, because there the money was "to be settled by my said trustees on herself and her issue," and yet even there the Court said the trust was not to be kept up.

Argued for the third party;—His mother Mrs Murray had only a life-

Argued for the fifth party;—There were no words used depriving Mrs Rowland of the absolute fee. Her share was settled in like manner to that of Mary Agnes, who undoubtedly got a fee. Alternatively, she got the fee, but the trustees were to see she did not dispose of the money except for onerous causes.

The sixth party adopted the argument of the fifth party.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This special case arises under the will of the late General Christie. The important part of the will is that in which the testator gives this direction to his trustees:—"To my three children I leave all the rest of my property, consisting of stocks and shares, or whatever belongs to me at my death. To be divided equally." Now, there are three children—two daughters and a son—and in reference to each of these, after this general bequest, he makes a separate settlement. He proceeds,—“Any share that my daughter Mary Agnes may receive to go direct to her and her children. Failing the above mentioned, her share to return to her nearest of kin, except her husband shall have the liferent.” That is all that he says about this share, and the question is, whether that bequest amounts to giving his daughter Mary Agnes, Mrs Murray, the fee of that share? I am of opinion that it does. “Failing the above mentioned,” I take to mean failing herself and her children while he is alive; but whether that be so or not, the direction is a distinct direction that any share that his daughter Mary Agnes receives is to go direct to her and her children. The subsequent words do not to my mind in any way qualify the right in her to the fee of that share.

But in the case of the other daughter and also of the son the direction is different. He says,—“My daughter Hughina Margaret's share I settle in like manner, excepting in the event of her decease without issue her share shall return to her nearest of kin.” That is for the purpose of excluding the husband's rights. Then he says,—“My trustees shall retain charge of her share. It is not to go into her hands.”

The first question is, whether that direction prevents the fee of that share from vesting in her? I am of opinion that it does not. I think that Hughina Margaret's share vests in her just as does that of Mary Agnes in Mary Agnes. But then the trustees are directed to retain this share. Is that a direction which, on the footing that the fee is the daughter's, can receive effect? I have had great difficulty upon that matter, which I understand some of your Lordships have shared. Some of the cases which have been quoted to us seem to negative the efficacy of such a direction. But I think in almost all of these cases it appeared that in order to prevent the actual money going into the hands of the person to whom the fee was given, it was practically necessary that the Court should set up a trust, and this was held to be beyond the power of the Court. That is not the case here. A trust is already created, and the testator directs his trustees to retain the charge of the shares. In my opinion that is a direction which they can obey.

Christie's
Trustees v.
Trustees.

I have arrived at the same conclusion with regard to the bequest to Charles. In regard both to his share and that of his sister Hughina Margaret, I think that the gift of the fee to them is not inconsistent with the direction that the trustees should take charge of the shares, and not hand over the corpora of the shares to Hughina or Charles.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. The only point of interest is that concerning the direction to the trustees to retain in their hands what is given to another in property. It is quite certain that you cannot give money or anything else upon the condition that it is not to be spent, or that only so much be spent and the remainder saved. That is a repugnancy. If you make a person proprietor he must act as proprietor. But I think we have a different case here. I think the donor of money or anything else is entitled to appoint a trust for the protection of the donee. We are not called upon here to determine the exact effect or the scope of the powers of the trustees as to retaining charge of these shares and not allowing them to go into the beneficiaries' hands. We are merely determining that it is their duty to retain these shares in their own hands, and not to allow them to go into the hands of the beneficiaries. And I think that, in that way, very substantial protection may be given to the beneficiaries, just such as the testator thought was required. I do not speak of creditors, or what may be done, possibly, in order to frustrate the testator's view, but I think it desirable that the protection contemplated by the testator should at least be started, and, for my part, I should think that the law would be efficacious, if appealed to, to prevent the testator's wish being frustrated. The shares are the property of the donees, but they are in the hands of the trustees, to be managed by them, and withheld from the donees for their protection. The trustees are not limited to giving the donees the interest merely. They may deal with the shares in the course of their administration and management as trustees—capital and interest—as they may think best for the interest of the donees as the proprietors. Their interest as proprietors is, I think, committed to the charge of the trustees by these words, although we are determining no more at this moment except that it is according to the true meaning of the deed, and the duty of the trustees under it, to retain these shares, and not allow either to pass into the hands of the proprietors.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD LEE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Answer the questions therein stated as follows, viz.—1 (a) That the fee of the share of the testator's estate bequeathed to his daughter Mrs Mary Agnes Christie or Murray vested in her a morte testatoris, and that the capital thereof is now payable by the first parties, General Christie's trustees, to the second parties, her marriage-contract trustees; 2 (a) that the fee of the share bequeathed to the testator's daughter Mrs Hughina Margaret Christie or Rowland vested in her a morte testatoris, but that the first parties are not bound to pay the capital to her now; and (b) are bound to hold it; 3 (a) that the fee of the share bequeathed to Charles Robert Christie vested in him a morte testatoris; (b) that the first parties are not bound to pay the capital thereof now to the party of the sixth part as his curator bonis; but (c) are bound to retain it," &c.

Walter.

Jurisdiction—Arrestment—Partnership.—A person to found jurisdiction against A, a domiciled Englishman, arrested in the hands of B all sums due by him to A. It was proved that B had in his hands a fund belonging to an English copartnery, of which A was a partner (and no other property in which A had an interest), and that while by the law of England a partnership has no persona, and the title to the partnership assets is in the individual partners, a partner has no beneficial right other than a right to a share of the surplus assets of the partnership on realisation.

Held by Lord Kinnear, Ordinary, that the arrestment was not effectual to found jurisdiction against A.

Jurisdiction—Slander—Publication.—Held by Lord Kinnear, Ordinary, that neither the direct dispatch by post of an English newspaper from the publishing office in England to persons in Scotland, nor the sale of the newspaper in Scotland, is sufficient to give the Scots Courts jurisdiction to entertain an action of damages for slander alleged to have been published in the newspaper.

On 11th August 1888 Charles Stewart Parnell, Member of Parliament for the city of Cork, raised an action against “John Walter, proprietor of The Times newspaper, and residing at No. 40 Upper Grosvenor Street, London, W., and George Edward Wright, printer and publisher of the said Times newspaper, Printing House Square, Blackfriars, London, E.C., —Defenders; against whom arrestments have been used ad fundandam jurisdictionem, in virtue of letters of arrestment signeted the 11th day of August 1888.”

The summons concluded for damages for slander alleged to have been published in The Times newspaper of the 18th April 1887 and of the 3d, 4th, 5th, and 6th July 1888.

The defenders pleaded;—1. No jurisdiction against either defender.

The pursuer pleaded;—1. The defenders are subject to the jurisdiction of this Court (1) in respect of the publication of the said newspaper in Scotland; and (2) in respect of the foresaid arrestments.

The following were the averments and answers bearing on the question of jurisdiction:—(Cond. 1) “The pursuer is proprietor of Avondale, in the county of Wicklow, Ireland, and he is also Member of Parliament for the city of Cork, and is the recognised leader of the Irish representatives in the House of Commons. The defender John Walter is the registered proprietor of The Times newspaper, under the Act 44 and 45 Vict. cap. 60, and the other defender, George Edward Wright, is the printer and publisher thereof. As the registered proprietor of the said newspaper Mr Walter is entitled to sue and liable to be sued in all actions relative thereto, and in that capacity he defended the action at the instance of Hugh Frank O'Donnell, hereinafter referred to, and other actions against the said newspaper. Mr Walter has also right as proprietor to recover and discharge debts due in respect of the said newspaper.” (Ans. 1) “Admitted that the pursuer is an Irish proprietor and Member of Parliament for the city of Cork. He is the leader of that section of the Irish representatives in the House of Commons known as the Parnellites or Nationalists. Admitted that the defender Wright is the printer and publisher of The Times newspaper, published in London. Explained that he is not a proprietor of The Times, but is only a salaried servant of the proprietors thereof. Admitted that the defender is the person who, in terms of the Act 44 and 45 Vict. cap. 60, is registered as a proprietor on behalf of himself and others of The Times newspaper, as defined by and

No. 166. for the purposes of the said Act. Quoad ultra denied, and explained that The Times is not the exclusive property of the defender Walter, and that he is not the proprietor thereof, but that it belongs to a partnership of which he is a member, along with Sir Henry Fraser Walter, Sir Edward Walter, and other persons, and that he is not entitled to sue nor liable to be sued in actions relative to the said newspaper." (Cond. 8) "The defenders not being resident in this country, the pursuer used arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem, conform to executions herewith produced. By the said arrestments funds have been attached in the hands of the arrestees, to which the defender Mr Walter has right, as proprietor of the said newspaper. It is denied that the said newspaper is only published in London. For many years prior to and in the months of April, May, and June 1887, and July 1888, copies thereof, and particularly of the issues of the several dates libelled, containing the foresaid facsimile letter, report, and articles, were sent by post by the defenders from their publishing office in London to many persons resident in Scotland, and to clubs and reading-rooms there, and were sent in parcels by rail to numerous news-agents throughout Scotland for sale and distribution to and among the general public there, and were by them so sold and distributed. The said newspaper thus was and is published by the defenders in Scotland." (Ans. 8) "Admitted that the defenders are not resident in Scotland. Explained further, that neither of the defenders is subject to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Courts. Denied that any jurisdiction has been founded against the defenders. The executions of the letters of arrestment are referred to. No sum whatever was due by the arrestees to either of the defenders, and nothing was consequently attached by said arrestments. The Times newspaper is only published in London. Quoad ultra denied." The defenders objected to the relevancy of these averments. They maintained (a) that publication was not per se a sufficient ground of jurisdiction; and (b) that the term "registered proprietor" in cond. 1 was ambiguous, in respect that it might mean either sole proprietor, or proprietor in virtue of the Act 44 and 45 Vict. cap. 60,* or proprietor in the sense of having a beneficial interest along with other partners; and that

Sec. 7 enacts,—“Where, in the opinion of the Board of Trade, inconvenience would arise or be caused in any case from the registry of the names of all the proprietors of the newspaper (either owing to minority, coverture, absence from the United Kingdom, minute subdivision of shares, or other special circumstances) it shall be lawful for the Board of Trade to authorise the registration of such newspaper in the name or names of some one or more responsible 'representative proprietors.'” on the question of jurisdiction.* <sup>Parnell v.</sup>

The defenders reclaimed.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question, or at least the most important question, which the Lord Ordinary had before him was whether arrestments had been used which had the effect of founding jurisdiction against the defender Mr Walter, and his Lordship came to be of opinion that he could not decide on that question without proof. I entirely agree with his Lordship. I think it would be a very rash thing indeed to say on the face of this record as it stands that it shews that there is no good arrestment to found jurisdiction, or that the averments of such an arrestment having been made are irrelevant. They do not appear to me to be irrelevant, and I think if the averments as made are established in point of fact the arrestment will probably be found to be good for its purpose. But it is not necessary to anticipate what the result of the proof may be. It is enough, I think, for the present purpose of disposing of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor to say that without evidence it is quite impossible to dispose of this question satisfactorily, and therefore I think the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary so far is open to no objection.

His Lordship has declined in the meantime to dispose of another objection to the jurisdiction of the Court, pleaded on behalf of the printer and publisher of this newspaper, Mr Wright, and it may be that that ground of jurisdiction is quite separable from the other, and might be disposed of separately. But when we come to that, it is really a matter dealing entirely with the course of procedure in the case, and your Lordships have always been exceedingly unwilling to interfere with the discretion of a Lord Ordinary in a matter of that kind. This question of jurisdiction will come to be determined along with the other, and I do not see such overwhelming expediency or necessity for disposing of this question separately as to lead me to interfere with this decision. I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD MURE.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and have nothing to add.

LORD SHAND.—It is a salutary rule of this Court, which has been long in observance, and has prevented very often a great deal of litigation at the initiatory stages of cases, that in a matter of procedure we should not interfere * "OPINION.—There are two separate grounds of jurisdiction upon which it is maintained that jurisdiction is founded. In the first place, the execution of arrestments for that purpose; and in the second place, the publication of the slander complained of in Scotland. I think it impossible to determine the questions raised upon the first of these two pleas until the facts have been ascertained. I think it quite indispensable to know what debt has been arrested, and what relation of debtor and creditor exists between the arrestees and the defender, if any such relation exists. As to the other ground of jurisdiction—publication in Scotland—I am not aware of any authority or precedent for sustaining an action of this kind against an Englishman domiciled and resident in England without either arrestment or personal service upon the defender; and if I were disposing of that point now, I should think it is probable that it might be disposed of upon the averments upon record alone; but I think it is not expedient to pronounce any formal judgment upon that point until the whole question of jurisdiction can be determined by one interlocutor. Therefore I shall allow parties a proof of their averments bearing upon the question of jurisdiction."

with what has been settled by the Lord Ordinary, unless it is established that injustice is to be done, or that some miscarriage of justice may follow from the course the Lord Ordinary has chosen. In this case it appears to me that the whole of the argument we have heard to-day will be quite open to the defender after this proof has been taken, and it is on that footing that I understand the Lord Ordinary has pronounced his judgment. The question whether the arrestments have or have not attached funds which belong to the defender Walter so as to make him liable to the jurisdiction of this Court is, as it appears to me, a question attended with some difficulty, and I must reserve any opinion about it till we have the proof, and I think it desirable that we should have the proof in order to reach a sound judgment on that point.

The only matter upon which I have any doubt—as to whether this interlocutor should be simply adhered to or not—arises from the argument presented by Mr Murray on the averment in article 8,—“By the said arrestments funds have been attached in the hands of the arrestees to which the defender Mr Walter has right as the registered proprietor of said newspaper.” It is said that under that averment the pursuer may probably propose to lead evidence as to English law. Well, I am not prepared to say that that is not competent; I think it would be quite competent. If the defender in such a case were taken by surprise by something of that kind, no doubt the Lord Ordinary could remedy it by saying, “This is a matter of which no notice was given. I shall not close the proof without giving the defender an opportunity of meeting it.” That would be very inconvenient, and it might be met by the pursuer giving notice of what he proposes to do—if he proposes to lead evidence of English law in fortification of the statement I have just read. That is the single consideration that weighs on my mind on the question whether this interlocutor be adhered to without some further averment, but I think an averment on that subject is not necessary.

As to the position of the other defender, Wright, the Lord Ordinary indicates that he thinks there is no ground of jurisdiction against him, but still he thinks it desirable to keep the case entirely together, and to dispose of it ultimately on the whole facts. I entirely agree in the course the Lord Ordinary has taken. I think it is desirable to get the facts before we decide upon any narrow question of relevancy, or upon any point such as has been argued on the part of the defenders.

LORD ADAM.—I also concur.

THE COURT adhered.

The evidence led at the proof was to the following effect:—The Times was established in 1785 by John Walter, the grandfather of the defender Walter. In his lifetime John Walter, the elder, gave off certain shares of the property in the paper by deeds inter vivos, and by testamentary disposition he bequeathed the remaining shares. These shares by subdivision (by deeds inter vivos or testamentary) came to belong to a number of persons. The defender Walter was one of these. There was no written contract of partnership between the proprietors. The printing premises and plant belonged to the defender Walter, who had been appointed manager by the other proprietors, under a deed of indenture dated 5th November 1846, and was joint manager along with his son, Arthur Fraser Walter, under a similar deed of indenture dated 22d June 1885. In the returns made under the Newspaper Registration Act, 1881, “John Walter” was entered as the proprietor until 1888, when (by authority of the Board of Trade) the entry was "John Walter, on behalf of himself and all others, the proprietors of such paper." At the date of the action, some of the other proprietors were minors.

No. 166.
July 3, 1889.
Parnell v.
Walter.

The pursuer adduced Messrs W. O. Danckwerts and Brodie Innes, and the defenders Messrs Lumley Smith, Q.C., and William Graham, all members of the English bar, as witnesses regarding the English law of partnership.

It was the opinion of all these witnesses that writing was not, by English law, essential to constitute a partnership—that such a contract might be inferred from the actings of the parties; it was further common ground that the circumstance that some of those who had a beneficial interest in the estate were minors (and so by English law incapable of contracting) was not fatal to the existence of a partnership between those who were sui juris, although the pursuer's witnesses considered that the fact that some of the parties were minors was a strong argument against the inference of partnership.

In the circumstances of the particular case, Messrs Danckwerts and Brodie Innes were of opinion that the relation between the parties beneficially interested in The Times was that of co-owners, not partners, at least as regarded the goodwill and the permanent element of The Times, but they appeared to admit that the actual business of publication was the property of a partnership. Messrs Lumley Smith and Graham, on the other hand, were of opinion that the sole relation was that of partners—the goodwill being a partnership asset; but that in any view, the subjects arrested belonged to the partnership. These subjects were sums (amounting in all to about £15) due by Edinburgh advertisement agents for advertisements inserted in The Times.

The property belonging to a partnership, according to English law, it was conceded on both sides, is in the individual partners—the partnership having no separate persona; but it is only the legal estate of which the individual partners have the property, their beneficial interest does not give them individually any right to the specific property of the partnership, but only to a share of the surplus assets on realisation. Hence an execution creditor of an individual partner could not take part of the partnership property in satisfaction of his debt; he could only force a dissolution, and recover payment out of the share found due to his debtor.

It was admitted that no property belonging to the defender Wright had been arrested.

The defenders did not dispute that The Times was sold and circulated in Scotland, but they maintained that it was not published there. The evidence shewed that they delivered copies of the paper at a post-office in London, or at a London railway station, to persons who had prepaid the price of the copies they desired to buy. It did not appear that the paper was ever delivered (as regards persons resident in Scotland) on any other footing.

Argued for the pursuer;—The pursuer had established jurisdiction on the grounds (a) of arrestment, and (b) of publication.

As regarded the first and more important of these grounds, there was no doubt that funds belonging to The Times (whatever that might mean) sufficient in amount to found jurisdiction had been well arrested; the amount was not illusory, and that, according to all the authorities, was sufficient. The next question was as to the body called The Times. What was the legal quality of the right possessed by a large number of persons who had, in the course of the last hundred years, come to be beneficially interested in The Times? The result of the evidence was that that right was a right of ownership, not a right of partnership;

No. 166.

 Parnell v.
 Walter.

but even if it were a right of partnership, the effect, in this question of jurisdiction, did not materially differ, for the result of the evidence was that the law of England did not recognise a partnership as a separate persona from the individual partners—the property of the partnership was just the property of the individual partners. The relation was identical with that of the co-owners of a ship. The pursuer having arrested property in Scotland undoubtedly belonging to The Times, had thus arrested property in Scotland belonging to Mr Walter individually, and so had well established jurisdiction in the Scots Courts against him. It was true that according to the defender's witnesses an execution creditor of a partner could not, in equity, carry off the partnership assets which he had attached, in satisfaction of the partner's debt to him; all he could do was to bring an accounting, and so bring about a dissolution of the partnership, but the pursuer did not propose to carry off the property he had arrested, and he had well arrested what was at law the property of the defender Walter, although equity might not permit the pursuer to appropriate that property specifically and without reference to the equities of the other partners. It did not affect the validity of the arrestment that the subject arrested might be owned by other persons than the person against whom it was desired to found jurisdiction, nor even that, on an accounting, nothing would be found to be due to the person whose interest bore to be arrested.<sup>1</sup>

But, even if the property arrested as being the property of a partnership was insufficient to found jurisdiction against an individual partner, jurisdiction was well established against the defender Walter, in the first place because he had been registered as the representative proprietor in virtue of the Newspaper Libel Act, 1881; in the second place, because he had until 1st August 1888, and therefore during the whole time in which the paper was publishing the slanders complained of, registered himself as "sole proprietor," and consequently having held himself out to the world as solely responsible for the paper, it was not open to him to deny responsibility now, and thirdly, because of the mandate in his favour conferred by the other proprietors in the deeds of 1846 and 1885; he was in short The Times. If it was desired to call The Times into Court, that was well effected by calling him.

In any case, The Times had been published in Scotland, and that per se was a good ground of jurisdiction in actions for slander alleged to have been uttered in the newspaper so published.

Argued for the defender;—The evidence shewed that the business of publishing The Times belonged to a partnership, and did not belong to a number of co-owners. It might be that the permanent element—the goodwill—of The Times did not belong to the partnership, but that was immaterial, for the debt arrested was due to the partnership, which carried on the business of publication. Now, it might be quite true that technically, according to English law, a partnership was not a separate persona, as it was in Scotland, but there was in substance no difference between the two laws. The individual partners, while they were the proprietors of the partnership assets, according to the English law had as such merely the legal estate—they were proprietors merely in a fiduciary sense; the beneficial interest was in the partners as a whole, and not as individuals. While the Scots law adopted the phraseology of a separate legal persona, that of England gave the legal title to the individual partners as trustees. In both systems the same result followed, that a debt due to the partnership could not be taken in satisfaction of a debt due by an individual partner. The beneficial interest of each partner was merely such an interest as resulted from a division of the surplus assets after realisation. No. 166.

But it was said that the defender, Mr Walter, had been reared up into such a position of responsibility as entitled the pursuer to arrest debts due to the partnership as being his individual debts, so as to found jurisdiction against him. That argument was based partly on the Newspaper Registration Act, and partly on the mandate in the deeds of 1846 and 1885, constituting him manager. Now, the Newspaper Registration Act, which did not extend to Scotland, while it might make Mr Walter the proper person to sue in the English Courts as representing the other partners, in no way altered the contract between the partners. It did not convert the debts due to the partnership into debts due to Mr Walter individually, and if it did not do that, it had no effect in the present question. The primary purpose of the Act was to prevent newspapers from concealing the identity of their proprietors, particularly in the case of actions for alleged slander, but while this was an action of that sort, the present question was one of jurisdiction, and depended entirely upon whether the estate arrested was the property of the defender, and the Act had no bearing on such a question. The answer to the argument on the alleged mandate in the deeds of 1846 and 1885 was the same. That mandate might confer very large powers of management on Mr Walter, but that did not make debts due to the concern debts due to him.

On 5th February the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lord Ordinary sustains the first plea in law for the defenders, dismisses the action, and decerns: Finds the defenders entitled to expenses." *

* "NOTE.—The only question which I can determine at present in this action is the question of jurisdiction. It is a remarkable action, in this respect, that neither of the parties is personally subject to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Court. The pursuer, who is not resident in Scotland, complains that he has been injured in his character and reputation by the publication of certain slanderous statements in The Times newspaper, and upon that ground he brings this action against the two defenders, as proprietor and printer of The Times, neither of these persons being resident in Scotland, but both of them being domiciled and resident in England. The defenders do not, as I understand, dispute that they are answerable for the statements which are published in The Times newspaper, but they maintain that they cannot be required to answer except in the Courts of their domicile, and that they are not subject to the jurisdiction of the Court of Scotland. The pursuer, on the other hand, maintains that this Court has jurisdiction upon two grounds—in the first place, because the newspaper which contained the slanderous statements of which he complains has been published in Scotland; and secondly, because he has arrested funds in Scotland belonging to the defenders. As to the first of these grounds, I have seen no reason to alter the opinion which I indicated upon a former occasion. I do not think it at all doubtful that The Times is published in Scotland; but there is no authority for holding that publication alone will give jurisdiction against a foreigner who has not been personally cited. I am not prepared to assent to the argument which Mr Balfour maintained, that publication ought to give jurisdiction, for reasons which he represented as being reasons of expediency and necessity. I think his argument inconsistent with the general doctrine both of our own law and of the civil law, both of which recognise the maxim, Actor sequitur forum rei; and accordingly, in the only case in which publication alone appears to have been suggested as a ground of jurisdiction it was rejected by the Court—I mean the case of Longworth v. Hope, July 1, 1865, 3 Macph. 149, 37 Scot. Jur. 552. Lord Colonsay says nothing directly as to this ground of jurisdiction, but it is evident that he thought it insufficient, because he speaks of the arrestment as the only ground upon which the jurisdiction of the Court could be sustained. Lord Curriehill expressed the opinion which I think is implied in the judgment of Lord Colonsay. Lord Curriehill says :—‘ I think we have no jurisdiction otherwise than in virtue of the arrestments. The circumstance of the alleged libel having been published by the defenders does not appear to me to be in itself sufficient ; for if the defenders, who reside in England, have merely published the newspaper complained of, I do not see how that would subject them to the jurisdiction of the Scottish Court.’

“ The other ground of jurisdiction is certainly anomalous, and probably it is as much opposed as the first to the general doctrine of law which I have mentioned. But it is a rule of the law of Scotland, too well established to be called in question, that the jurisdiction of this Court over foreigners may be created by the arrestment of their personal funds in this country ; and it was decided in Longworth v. Hope that this mode of jurisdiction is applicable to actions of damages for slander. The jurisdiction, therefore, comes to depend upon its being established that funds belonging to the defenders, or either of them, have been effectually attached by the pursuer’s arrestment. It is not now maintained that any fund belonging to the defender Mr Wright has been so attached, and therefore, so far as he is concerned, the case is necessarily at an end. But the question remains as to whether funds belonging to Mr Walter have been attached. Now, the arrestments upon which the pursuer founds are in ordinary form ; and the execution bears to attach in the hands of certain arrestees, certain sums, more or less, due and addebted by them to the said John Walter, or to any other person or persons for his use and behoof. It appears from the evidence of the arrestees that they have incurred debts for the price of certain advertisements which they have inserted in The Times newspaper. The defender says that he is not the proper creditor in these debts, but that the true creditor is a copartnership or firm of which he is a member ; and if that be so it would follow that he has no direct right of action to recover debts contracted to this firm of which he is a member ; and, consequently, that those debts could not be attached by arrestments in the terms I have mentioned. Now, that raises two questions. In the first place, whether the debts in question are owing to Mr Walter as an individual or to the firm of which he says he is a member ; and in the second place, if they are owing to the firm, whether the right of Mr Walter as an individual partner is such that the debts due to the firm can be effectually taken in execution of his separate debt. Both of these questions must be determined by the law of England, which I must take as matter of fact to be ascertained by the evidence of experts. I had the advantage of hearing from the learned counsel who were examined as witnesses a very able and interesting exposition of the law of England upon these two points ; and I have the more satisfaction in considering their opinions, because I find that upon all points which are material to the present question they are substantially at one. I do not think it necessary to examine the evidence in detail. The result of it is to make it perfectly clear that the debts in question are not owing to Mr Walter as an individual, but that they are owing to a firm of copartners of which he and others are members. The fact of partnership being established, the next question is, whether, according to the law of England, the right of a partner of a trading firm in the assets of the copartnership is of such a character that the debts due to the firm may be taken in execution by the separate creditors of a partner for the satisfaction of his separate debts. I think it is established by the evidence that in that respect the law of England is precisely the same as the law of Scotland. The evidence shews that the assets of a copartnership belong to the partners jointly, each of them having an undivided interest in the whole ; and what is meant by the share of a partner is thus explained by a very eminent writer, to whose work counsel referred,—‘ What is meant by the share of a partner is his proportion of the partnership assets after they have all been realised and converted into money, and all debts and liabilities have been paid and discharged.<sup>1</sup> That is the law of England, as it is proved in evidence; and I think it is a perfectly accurate statement of the law of Scotland also. It follows as a necessary consequence that debts due to the firm cannot be taken in execution by a separate creditor of a partner for debts due by him as an individual. It is said that the rule of our law, by which the separate creditors of an individual partner cannot arrest debts due to the copartnery, arises from a principle which is not recognised in England, inasmuch as the law of that country does not treat the firm as a separate person distinct from its members. But it is not, in my opinion, because of the mere impersonation of the firm that its assets cannot be arrested by the creditors of a partner, but because the partner has no separate share in the assets which is capable of being attached by that diligence. The principle is that a partner has no right to claim any particular portion of the assets as belonging exclusively to him, and neither his assignees nor his separate creditors can have any higher right against the joint property than the debtor or cedent from whom they derive their interest. The true ground, therefore, is that which is stated in Lord Pitfour's note, quoted by Mr Bell, when he says that the creditors of the partner can only affect his share of the balance after payment of the copartnery debts.

"The proposition maintained for the pursuer is a very startling one, because it comes to this, that the separate creditor of any partner of an English trading firm may arrest funds belonging to the firm which he may find situated in Scotland, and carry them off for the satisfaction of his separate debt. There is no authority in the law of Scotland for that proposition. I think the principle upon which we should hold that the arrestments now in question were quite ineffectual to attach debts due to a Scottish copartnery is equally applicable to the case of debts due to a copartnery in England. Mr Balfour in his argument referred to the cases in which it has been held that ships may be arrested for the debts of a part owner. There is no analogy between these cases and the present, because the right of a part owner in a ship is altogether different in its legal character from the interest of a partner in the assets of a trading firm, and also because the arrestment of a ship is a diligence of a totally different kind from the arrestment of a debt. The arrestment of a ship is a diligence in rem. The ship itself is seized and detained in port. But the objection which the defender takes to the arrestments founded upon is, that they attach nothing. The arrestment of a debt either for founding jurisdiction or for execution operates in a totally different way from the seizure of a corporeal moveable. It operates in personam. It interpellates the arrestee from paying his debt to his proper creditor, and ultimately compels him to make it forthcoming to the arresting creditor, and thereby discharges him of his debt to his own creditor. And since that is the mode in which the diligence operates, it follows of necessity that it cannot affect debts payable to anyone, except the person designed in the arrestment. An arrestment of debts due to the defender personally will not prevent the arrestee from paying his debt to the firm, of which the defender is only a single member. It will give him no answer to the demands of the firm, which is his true creditor. It would not compete with an arrestment by the firm's creditors of debts due to the firm; it attaches nothing.

"It is said that, by reason of the defender's mandate as manager, all the proprietors of The Times are responsible for a wrong done by him in the conduct of the newspaper, and therefore that the pursuer has his remedy against the property of them all. And Mr Balfour in the course of that argument said—and I think quite soundly—that it was a very good test of the validity of an arrestment for founding jurisdiction to consider whether a fund which is attached by that arrestment could be taken in execution by the decree sought for in the action. Now, I cannot assume that persons who are not called as defenders are

Process—Nobile Officium—Certified copy of proceedings in Scottish Courts—Clerk's certificate.—On the petition of one of the parties to a cause the Court authorised and required the Principal Clerk of the Division to certify a copy of the proceedings for production in the Irish Courts in a similar action there between the same parties.

1st DIVISION.
C.(VIDE Parnell v. Walter and Another, Feb. 5, 1889, ante, p. 917.)

The action of damages for libel at the instance of Charles Stewart Parnell, M.P., against John Walter and another was dismissed by the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) on the ground of want of jurisdiction on 5th February 1889, and a reclaiming note was thereupon presented by the pursuer to the First Division.

Subsequently Mr Parnell raised an action of damages for the same libel against the same defenders in the High Court of Justice in Ireland, and an order for service was granted by the Court. Mr Walter thereupon applied to have the order for service set aside on the ground of the dependency of the above proceedings in the Scottish Courts.

This was a note by Mr Walter in which he prayed the Court to direct the principal Clerk of the First Division "to sign an authenticated copy of the proceedings" in the Court of Session, which he stated was required in order to support his contention in the Irish Courts.

It appeared that the Clerk had found himself unable to give the certificate required, as he knew of no authority which bound or entitled him to do so.

Counsel for the petitioners founded upon the 14th section of the Act 50 Geo. III. cap. 112,† which he maintained could not be held to be repealed by the Statute Law Revision No. 2 Act (35 and 36 Vict. cap. 97), sec. 1, schedule, although in terms that was so. The section in question did not fall within the preamble of the Statute Law Revision Act, and the enacting clause of that Act bore that the Act should not "affect any form or course of pleading, practice, or procedure." Even without any statutory authority, the Court must have power to direct some method of certifying such proceedings.<sup>1</sup> If the view of the Clerk was correct, nothing but a certified copy of the interlocutor could be given.

responsible for the wrong of which the pursuer complains. But supposing that they could be made responsible, I think it very clear that no decree in this action could be pronounced against anyone except the individual defenders, and that no writ of execution founded upon the decree, could be carried into effect against the property of anybody else. The proposed test therefore appears to me to be quite conclusive of the question. The debts arrested are debts which are due, not to the individual defender, but to him and a number of other persons jointly, and no decree in this action could be carried into execution by ordering payment of these debts to the separate creditor of the defender. There is no other ground of jurisdiction, I think, requiring consideration, and the judgment, therefore, must be to sustain the first plea in law for the defender, and to dismiss the action."

ELDRED & BIGNOLD AND ANOTHER, Claimants.—Gloag—Kennedy.

ROBERT STEWART, Claimant.—Murray—J. Wilson.

Jurisdiction—Foreign—Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa—Defeasible right.—On 26th May 1887 A, to found jurisdiction against B, a domiciled Englishman, arrested in the hands of C a sum due by him to B under a decree for costs in an English action, and on the following day A served a summons upon B.

On 13th June 1887 B's English solicitors obtained from the English Court a charging order, which by the law of England had the effect not only of transferring B's claim for costs to them, but of invalidating any prior attachment by a creditor of B.

B pleaded no jurisdiction, and the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) sustained the plea, on the ground that B's claim for costs against C being defeasible the arrestment was ab initio ineffectual to attach the debt.

On a reclaiming note the Court reversed the Lord Ordinary's judgment, holding that as there was a debt due by C to B at the date of the arrestment jurisdiction had been duly constituted when the summons was served, and that the subsequent transfer of B's right did not affect the jurisdiction already constituted.

Arrestment—Foreign—English decree for costs—Charging order.—A on the dependence of an action against B arrested in the hands of C a sum due by him to B under a decree for costs in an English action. B's English solicitors subsequently obtained a "charging order" from the English Court, which by the law of England had the effect not only of transferring B's right to them, but of invalidating any prior attachments of the fund by his creditors. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kinnear) that the claim of the English solicitors was preferable to that of A.

On 26th May 1887 Robert Stewart, farmer, Elibank, near Peebles, used arrestments in the hands of John Welsh, residing in Edinburgh, of all sums due by him to Colonel John Thomas North, residing near London, to found jurisdiction against North. 1st DIVISION.
Lord Kinnear.
C.

At the date of these proceedings North held a judgment of the High Court of Justice, dated 25th April 1887, against Welsh for payment of £419, 11s. 4d. of costs in an action which Welsh had raised against him in England.

Stewart subsequently raised an action of count, reckoning, and payment in the Court of Session against North, and, on the dependence of that action, on 27th May 1887, used arrestments in Welsh's hands of the sum due by him to North to satisfy any judgment that might be pronounced in favour of the pursuer of the action.

On 1st June 1887 a certificate of the judgment for costs in name of North was registered in the Books of Council and Session under the Judgments Extension Act, 1868.

No. 168.

July 5, 1889.
Stewart v.
North.

On 13th June 1887 Messrs Eldred & Bignold, Colonel North's solicitors, obtained from Mr Justice Smith in chambers an order that they should have a charge upon the costs recovered for their costs in the English action.

At the request of Mr Welsh's agents a copy of the charging-order was sent to them on 14th July 1887.

In his defences to Stewart's action, lodged on 21st July 1887, North stated, inter alia, that the sum in the decree against Welsh was not arrestable or attachable in respect of claims against North, as Messrs Eldred & Bignold, solicitors in London, who had acted for North and were owed in respect of costs, &c. a sum exceeding the £419, 11s. 4d., were in right of the whole fund which was due and payable only to them. "According to the law of England, so long as the costs of the solicitors of the party found entitled to costs by decree of Court are not otherwise paid or satisfied, the debtor in the said decree is not entitled to pay or satisfy the decree except with their assent or through their hands, and they have a lien on the decree and all costs payable to their client in the cause for the full amount of their costs as between solicitor and client, which lien attaches ipso jure on judgment being signed, and is preferable to the claim of any assignee or creditor of their client. The said solicitors are held as creditors in the said debt, quoad their unpaid or unsatisfied costs, substantially to the same effect as law-agents who have obtained decree for expenses in the Courts of Scotland, in their own names, as agents disbursers."

North pleaded;—(1) The said debt not being arrestable by a creditor of the defender, no jurisdiction has been founded against him. (2) The alleged arrestments not having affected any property of the defender, and being inept to found jurisdiction, the jurisdiction ought not to be sustained, and the present action should be dismissed, with expenses.

The defender was allowed a proof of his averments in support of the plea of no jurisdiction, and thereafter the following queries were adjusted for the opinion of English counsel:—"1. Was North, before his solicitors obtained the charging order, entitled, while his solicitors' account for the costs of the action remained unpaid, to demand payment to himself of the amount of costs found due in the action, or were the solicitors the true creditors to the exclusion of their client? 2. What was the effect, if any, either at common law or under the provisions of the 28th section of 23 and 24 Vict. c. 127, upon the respective rights of the solicitors and North of the charging order, and, in particular, had it any retrospective effect upon their respective rights?"

Mr R. B. Finlay, Q.C., returned the following opinion:—"Query 1. Colonel North was, before his solicitors obtained the charging order, entitled to demand payment to himself of the amount of costs found due to him by Mr Welsh, and could have given a good receipt for it (Mercer v. Graves, L. R., 7 Q. B. 499), but Messrs Eldred & Bignold, in virtue of their particular lien for costs in that action, might, at any time while the money remained unpaid, have given notice to Mr Welsh not to pay Colonel North, and if, after such notice, Mr Welsh had paid Colonel North he might have been compelled to pay again to Messrs Eldred & Bignold (Omerod v. Tate, 1 East, 464). To this extent, but no further, were Messrs Eldred & Bignold the true creditors to the exclusion of Colonel North. In virtue of this lien, as it has been called, the claim of Messrs Eldred & Bignold, in respect of their costs, would have priority over an attachment obtained by a judgment creditor of Colonel North against Mr Welsh as garnishee, if notice of their lien had previously been given to the garnishee (Eisdale v. Conyngham, 28 L. J., Ex. 213; Simpson v. Prothero, 26 L. J., Chy. 671), and I think even where notice had not been so given, though on this last point there does not appear to be any direct authority. In the case of Hough v. Edwards (1 H. and N. 171) the solicitor had no lien for costs in the proceedings in which the judgment had been recovered. No. 168.

July 5, 1889.
Stewart v.
North.

"Query 2. I am of opinion that the charging order of the 13th June 1887 conferred a valid title upon Messrs Eldred & Bignold under the statute, and that such charging order had a retrospective effect. This order was properly made, as costs are 'property recovered' within the meaning of the section (per Brett, M.R., in Dallow v. Garrold, 14 Q. B. D., p. 545, 546). A charging order under the statute 23 and 24 Vict. c. 127, sec. 28, gives the solicitor priority over a judgment creditor who has previously served a garnishee summons (Dallow v. Garrold, 14 Q. B. D. 543). As Mr Stewart was of course aware that the sum which he arrested was payable under a judgment, he had constructive notice of the lien of Colonel North's solicitors (Faithful v. Ewen, 7 Ch. D. 495). I am of opinion that the charging order converted the inchoate right of Messrs Eldred & Bignold at common law into an actual charge, and made them the owners in equity of the sum due from Mr Welsh to the extent of their claim against Colonel North. . . ."

The Lord Ordinary (Kinnear), on 3d November 1888, found that the arrestments were inept and ineffectual to found jurisdiction, and dismissed the action.*

* "OPINION.—The question whether the arrestments used by the pursuer are effectual to found jurisdiction depends upon the relative rights of Colonel North and his solicitors, Messrs Eldred & Bignold, in the debt which is said to have been attached.

"Before the date when the arrestments were used Colonel North had obtained judgment against the arrestee for the sum of £419, 11s. 4d., as the taxed costs of a suit in the High Court of Justice in England. At the date when the defences in the present action were lodged, Messrs Eldred & Bignold had obtained a charging order, the legal effect of which is explained in Mr Finlay's opinion. It was held, in Walls' Trustees v. Drynan, 15 R. 359, that the question raised by a plea to jurisdiction is 'not whether the Court had jurisdiction over the defender at any antecedent time, but whether it has jurisdiction de presenti, at the time when the objection is stated,' and if it were to be held in accordance with that judgment, that the question is to be determined with exclusive reference to the state of rights at the time when defences are lodged, it would appear to me to follow from Mr Finlay's opinion that the jurisdiction is not well founded, because at that time the arrestments were, according to the opinion, ineffectual. Mr Finlay says, not merely that the charging order 'conferred a valid title upon Messrs Eldred & Bignold,' but also that it had a retrospective effect, so as to give them a priority over an attachment previously obtained by a creditor of Colonel North.

"It is enacted by the statute to which the learned counsel refers, section 28, that 'all conveyances and acts done to defeat, or which shall operate to defeat, such charge or right, shall, unless made to a bona fide purchaser without notice, be absolutely void and of no effect as against such charge or right.' It seems to be clear enough, both from the opinion and from the case of Dallow v. Garrold, cited by Mr Finlay, that the pursuer, as arresting creditor, does not fall within the exception in favour of purchasers without notice, and accordingly it was hardly disputed that in the multiplepoinding Messrs Eldred & Bignold must be preferred, because in a question with them the arrestments used by the pursuer are absolutely void.

"But it is said that the true point of time to be considered is the date when the arrestment was used to found jurisdiction, because, if that arrestment were effectual at the time, no subsequent event could displace the jurisdiction thereby established. It may be that that is a sound proposition, and I do not think

Stewart reclaimed, and argued ;—The question of jurisdiction fell to be determined with relation to the validity of the arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa as at the time when it was laid on. It could not matter that the subject arrested had been removed at a later date, if the jurisdiction had once been established.<sup>1</sup> The judgment giving the defendant the costs in the English suit was in favour of Colonel North himself. The charging order did not become operative in any way, or affect the arrested fund until it had been applied for and pronounced. Until then Colonel North was himself the creditor, and could not be said to be in there is anything to the contrary in the judgments delivered in the case of Walls, but I think the arrestment was inept from the beginning, because I must hold, in accordance with Mr Finlay's opinion, that it was ineffectual to attach the debt. It is true that before the solicitors obtained the charging order Colonel North could have demanded payment, but Messrs Eldred & Bignold might at any time while the money remained unpaid have given notice to Mr Welsh not to pay to Colonel North. Colonel North therefore had at no time an exclusive right to recover, and his right such as it was could not be made available to attach the debt so as to exclude Messrs Eldred & Bignold, because they could defeat the attachment so long as the money remained unpaid. They have in fact defeated the arrestment, and they must obtain decree in the multiplepounding* for payment of the money alleged to have been well arrested by Mr Stewart. It appears to me impossible to give effect to their claim in that action, and at the same time to hold in the present action that the money was effectually arrested by the competing claimant in the multiplepounding.

"It is said that the arrestment to found jurisdiction is in a totally different position from an arrestment in execution, because it does not impose a nexus. It may not be a lasting nexus, and there may be a question how long it continues. But still, like any other arrestment, it must be effectual to attach the subject arrested, for the purpose for which it is used, or else it must be inept.

"The nexus must be capable of subsisting until the time when the objection to jurisdiction can be pleaded, or else it is of no effect. This appears to me to be very clearly brought out in the Lord President's judgment in the case of Lindsay (22 D. 571), where he explains the meaning of an arrestment to found jurisdiction. 'It means this, that it fixes a subject in the country, and the subject being in the country, the party is answerable to the jurisdiction of this Court.' On this principle, it was held in the case of Trowsdale's Trustees v. The Forcett Railway Company, 9 M. 88, that in order to found jurisdiction by arrestment the subject arrested must be capable of attachment by diligence in execution; and Lord Neaves states the reason very much in the same way as the Lord President does in Lindsay's case. 'The principle rests on the fact that there is something within the jurisdiction of the Court which can be specifically taken in execution of any decree which may be pronounced. . . . We must not extend the fiction beyond the limits already recognised. I am not aware of its having been extended beyond circumstances where the arrestment shews that the decree will not be a brutum fulmen, from there being a subject within the jurisdiction of the Court which can be attached.' It is true that the effect of the decree is not to be measured by the value of the subject arrested. But the subject, whatever be its value, must be effectually seized by the arresting creditor, although the seizure may be only temporary, and although it may cease to operate without the procedure which is necessary to determine the effect of an arrestment in execution.

"In the present case, the arrestment has fixed nothing within the country. There is no subject attached which could be taken in execution of a decree against the defender. The arrestment is therefore, in my opinion, inept.

"No other ground of jurisdiction is alleged."

any way a trustee for his solicitors. The law of Scotland recognised as No. 168. good an arrestment ad fundandam upon a fund to which the creditor's right was defeasible.<sup>1</sup> No doubt, it was not the same question whether an arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem was good, and whether the arrestment would be upheld in a forthcoming. But the criterion of arrestability in both cases was the same. It had been held that debts might be arrested currente termino.<sup>2</sup> An arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem imposed no nexus,<sup>3</sup> and its purpose was served when the jurisdiction was founded. Assuming that the charging order had the effect which Mr Finlay in his opinion attributed to it, it could at anyrate—founded as it was on an English statute—have no more than a local effect, and did not, at least retrospectively, affect the nature of the right to the fund.

July 5, 1889.
Stewart v. North.

Argued for Colonel North;—It had been laid down that jurisdiction was not to be extended beyond what was warranted by authority and precedent.<sup>4</sup> The date at which the validity of the arrestments ad fundandam fell to be determined was the 4th July 1887, when the defences were lodged.<sup>5</sup> In order to make an effectual arrestment ad fundandam it must be shewn that there was a nexus laid on the fund which was capable of being continued until the jurisdiction was prorogated or satisfaction was given. The arrestment was to be taken subject to all modifications tantum et tale as it stood in the arrestee.<sup>6</sup> When the arrestment was laid on here, there were practically no funds in the hands of the arrestee, for they were nothing more than a sum of expenses due to Messrs Bignold. They had the entire beneficial interest, although ex facie it might be in Colonel North. It could make no difference in the relation of parties that the English decree had been made a Scots decree under the Judgments Extension Act.

At advising, on 14th June 1889,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—In this case the Lord Ordinary has found “that the arrestments used by the pursuer in the hands of Mr John Welsh are inept and ineffectual to found jurisdiction,” and he has dismissed the action.

I am unable to agree with the Lord Ordinary, and I am of opinion that the arrestments which were used for the purpose of founding jurisdiction were effectual for that purpose. The debt which was due by the arrestee to the defender arose out of a judgment which was pronounced in the English Courts against him, in which he was found liable in costs to Colonel North. That judgment was subsequently registered in Scotland, and thereafter had the effect of a judgment of this Court, in so far as it was necessary to make it a foundation for diligence.

action took place on 26th May 1887. The summons was signeted on the following day, and on the same date arrestments on the dependence of that action were used. In the present case we have nothing to do with the arrestments on the dependence, and the present question falls to be dealt with as if they had never been used. The validity and effect of the arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem are the matters we have to decide.

The reason why the arrestments are said to be ineffectual is that the London solicitors of the defender are said to be entitled to a preference on the arrested fund in competition with their client, and with all the world. That would, no doubt, have been so, if they had been in possession of a charging order from the English Courts. But they did not get a charging order until the 13th June, and the arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem were used, as I have said, on the 26th May. On that date the arrestee was undoubtedly a debtor to the defender. That he should afterwards cease to be a debtor to the defender, either by assignation of the debt or by any competent legal diligence, does not prevent the action from being good at the date when it was raised. And if it was good then I am of opinion that it does not affect its validity for the purpose of jurisdiction that the fund which was arrested in order to found the jurisdiction was afterwards carried off by someone else. An arrestment to found jurisdiction cannot be followed by a furthcoming, and in no other way can an arrestment ad fundandam be made available for the purposes of payment. Accordingly, an arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem can never be used for other purposes than merely to lay upon the funds in the hands of the arrestee such a nexus, or whatever else it may be called, as will found jurisdiction in this Court. The charging order in this case is not very different from any other diligence which is preferable not by reason of its priority in point of time but by reason of inherent right. The arrestment on the dependence may be defeated by a subsequent preference caused by the charging order, but it depended on whether the English solicitors chose to obtain the charging order or not. They might have refrained altogether from taking the order, trusting to their client to recover the costs himself, or their debt might have been satisfied. In fact, it was a mere contingency whether the debt would be affected by the charging order, and the circumstance of its having the possible effect of carrying off the fund at a subsequent time did not in any way affect the value of the arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem at the time it was used.

I see that the Lord Ordinary has referred to the case of Wall's Trustees v. Drynan, 15 R. 359, and it appears to me that his Lordship has misunderstood the point which the Court settled in that case. He says,—“It was held, in Wall's Trustees v. Drynan, 15 R. 359, that the question raised by a plea to jurisdiction is ‘not whether the Court had jurisdiction over the defender at any antecedent time, but whether it has jurisdiction de presenti, at the time when the objection is stated.’” The point which the Court was called upon to settle in that case was whether an arrestment to found jurisdiction was used too late or not. It was used in that case after the signeting of the summons, and my opinion was to the effect that the question fell to be determined as at the date when the objection was stated, and that if there was jurisdiction then the time at which the arrestment was used was of no consequence. And so, in the present case, if I could affirm that there was no jurisdiction when the defence was taken, I should sustain the objection; but I am of opinion that there was jurisdiction, because antecedent to the raising of the summons arrestments were used against a fund which then belonged to the defender.

No. 168.

Stewart v.
North.

I am therefore for recalling the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and repelling the plea against the jurisdiction.

LORD MURE.—I concur with your Lordship. As to the facts of the case, I do not think it can be disputed that when the arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem was used there were funds in the hands of the arrestee to which the defender had a valid claim, so that the jurisdiction of the Court was, I conceive, well founded at the time when the arrestment was laid on. It now, however, appears that a firm of English solicitors had a contingent interest over the fund, and that in order to secure that interest they obtained a charging order from the Courts in England some days after the arrestments were used, and it is contended that the effect of that charging order, in accordance with the opinion of English counsel, was to transfer the fund in question to the solicitors. But even assuming that to be the case, the circumstance will not have the effect of invalidating the arrestment as a means of founding jurisdiction. Because it is in my opinion settled that if an arrestment is ex facie well laid on when used, the fact that another party has made a claim to the arrested fund as not belonging to the debtor will not interfere with the jurisdiction. The rule applicable to this question was, I think, fixed in the case of Douglas v. Jones, 9 S. 856, where the Court held, in a question as to the validity of an arrestment to found jurisdiction, that it was not relevant to allege that it would turn out upon inquiry that the defender had in reality no interest in the fund arrested. The decision in that case appears to me to apply here.

LORD SHAND.—At the time when the arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem were used, decree had been granted in favour of Colonel North for £419, and the opinion of English counsel is to the effect that Colonel North was at that time entitled "to demand payment to himself of the amount of costs found due to him by Mr Welsh, and could have given a good receipt for it." Accordingly when the arrestments were laid on, the funds arrested were funds of which Colonel North could have demanded payment, and which Mr Welsh would have been in safety to pay to him. It further appears that, as time went on, Colonel North's solicitors applied to the English Courts for a charging order, as they had right to do, and obtained it, and in accordance with the opinion to which I have referred, when that charging order was got and intimated Colonel North's right to the fund came to an end.

The question is whether at the date when the arrestments were laid on the fund in question was an arrestable subject. It was undoubtedly a fund to which the defender then had right, although the right was one of a defeasible nature, but until the right was defeated it certainly possessed a value for the defender. It was of such value that it could be made the subject of a transaction. In these circumstances, I have no doubt that it was an arrestable right which was capable of founding jurisdiction.

The arrestments were used before the summons was signeted. It was afterwards signeted, and the action raised. That is in accordance with the ordinary practice, and is, in my opinion, the correct and proper practice to be adopted, where an action is to proceed on jurisdiction founded on or created by arrestments. But the point urged by the respondent was that the charging order was obtained, and the defender's right to the fund in question was defeated before the defences were lodged. That circumstance cannot, in my opinion, affect the jurisdiction of the Court, which undoubtedly existed when the action was raised. It is said that upon the authority of the case of Walls v. Drynan, 15 R. 359, the date of the lodging of the defences is the time to which the Court must look, in order to see whether there is jurisdiction against a defender. I did not take part in that judgment, but it seems to me that the point which was decided was in the language of the Lord President (p. 363), thus expressed :—" It is enough to say that jurisdiction is founded in perfectly good time if it is founded when the summons is served, because until the summons is served there is no action." This view in no way conflicts with the pursuer's contention in this case. In the present case, there was jurisdiction founded even before the summons was signeted, in accordance with the usual and, as I think, the proper practice. I see nothing in the decision in Walls' case to lead me to the conclusion that arrestments which were good as at the date when they were used could lose their effect because of something which happened between that date and the lodging of the defences.

Stewart v.
North.

I therefore agree with your Lordship that we must recall the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and repel the plea of want of jurisdiction.

LORD ADAM.—Upon 26th May 1887 the pursuer executed an arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa in Mr Welsh's hands, upon the allegation that the latter was debtor to Colonel North, the defender, in a sum of £419, 11s. 4d., the costs in an action between Mr Welsh and Colonel North in the English Courts in which the latter was successful. Ex facie, there is no doubt that this was a debt due by Mr Welsh to Colonel North, but as I understand the argument, it is said that it was truly a debt due by the former to the English solicitors of the latter. Upon that matter, the opinion of English counsel which is before us is to the effect that up to the 13th June Colonel North was entitled to demand payment of these costs, and Mr Welsh was bound to pay them. If that be so, I cannot understand a better description of what will constitute a debt, and accordingly I think the arrestment was good as at the 26th May.

On the 27th May, a summons was served upon the defender, and arrestments were used upon the dependence of the action. If there was a valid and pending action against the defender, he was bound to answer the citation which was thus given him, not because the service could create jurisdiction, but because the jurisdiction was created previously. The arrestment was the means by which the defender was validly cited to appear, and as soon as it had served its purpose in that way, it was of no further use, and there was an end of it. It is said that the effect of the charging order was to sweep away the fund which had been validly arrested, and a question has also arisen as to the effect to be given to the arrestment on the dependence of the action. But neither of these can touch the validity of the arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causa, which was, I think, perfectly good to found jurisdiction as of the date on which it was used.

I am of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary is wrong, and must be reversed.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, repelled the first and second pleas of the defender, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

The question as to the effect of the arrestments used by Mr Stewart on the dependence of his action was raised in a multiplepinding raised by Mr Welsh, the fund in medio being the sum due by him of costs in the English action, the amount of which he had consigned in Court. No. 168.
 July 5, 1889.
 Stewart v. North.

Messrs Eldred & Bignold and Colonel North lodged a joint claim. The former claimed the whole fund, and Colonel North claimed only in the event of their claim not being sustained.

The former pleaded;—(1) In respect of their holding the said decree for their costs as from the 25th day of April 1887, the claimants are entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim. (2) The said fund not being arrestable by any creditor of North's at the date of the said arrestments being used, and the alleged arrestments being inept, the claimants should be preferred to the arrestor or alleged arrestor. (3) The right of the claimants being preferable to arrestments laid on subsequent to 25th April 1887, they should be ranked and preferred in terms of their claim.

Mr Stewart claimed the whole fund, and pleaded;—(1) The claimant having attached under the diligence set forth the fund in medio, he is entitled to be ranked and preferred in terms of his claim.

The proof in the action Stewart v. North was held as proof in this action.

On 3d November 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) sustained the claim for Messrs Eldred & Bignold to the whole fund in medio.

Mr Stewart reclaimed, and argued;—The effect of the charging order was confined to England; it was a remedy simply upon the English Statute of 23 and 24 Vict. cap. 127, and was of no avail here. Besides by the registration of the decree, the decree became a Scots decree, and the operation of English law was entirely excluded.

Argued for Messrs Eldred & Bignold;—Looking to the terms of Mr Finlay's opinion, the charging order transferred the whole right to the arrested fund to Messrs Eldred, who were therefore entitled to be preferred to the fund in preference to Colonel North. As against Stewart, the question fell to be decided altogether apart from that relating to the jurisdiction ad fundandam.<sup>1</sup>

LORD PRESIDENT.—I think that the Lord Ordinary was right in sustaining the claim for Eldred & Bignold. The fund in medio consists of a sum which is due by Welsh, the arrestee, to Colonel North under a judgment of the High Court of Justice in England. This sum is the amount of costs found due to Colonel North in an action by Welsh against him in which he was successful. So long as there was no interposition on the part of the English solicitors he could have accepted payment from Welsh, and Welsh would have been safe in making payment to him. But it was in the power of the English solicitors to interpose, obtaining what is known as a "charging order," which had, it appears, the effect of transferring the right from North to them. I think that according to the law of England as it is explained very clearly in the opinion of Mr Finlay, and it is by the law of England as so explained that we must decide, this right of Colonel North was a qualified right. The arresting creditor arrested in the hands of the debtor under the English judgment the sum for which Welsh was accountable to North. But if he was not accountable to North—if he was not liable to account to North,—then that which was arrested was not prestable by the arrestee, for the charging order though subsequent to the arrestment has the effect of making Welsh, the arrestee, accountable to Eldred & Bignold instead of to North.

Therefore, I think, Eldred & Bignold were preferable, and that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right.

LORD MURE.—I agree in thinking that we must decide this question according to the law of England, and I have no difficulty in concurring with your Lordship. The import of the opinion of English counsel is that by the step taken by Eldred & Bignold the right of North was transferred to and became absolute in them. That being so, I think they are to be preferred.

LORD SHAND.—The sum arrested was the amount of a decree for costs obtained by North in a suit before the High Court of Justice in England. Subsequently to the arrestment in the hands of Welsh, Messrs Eldred & Bignold obtained a charging order, which is dated 13th June, and intimated to Welsh on 14th July. The question is whether that charging order had, when duly intimated, the effect of entitling Eldred & Bignold to obtain decree for the money arrested, preferably to Stewart, the arresting creditor. I am of opinion with your Lordships that the arrestment is not good in a question with Eldred & Bignold. The question must be determined by the law of England, and that for the reason that it is a question not of the particular remedy, but of the right itself. Now, the nature of North's right is explained in three passages of the opinion of Mr Finlay. He says,—“Colonel North was, before his solicitors obtained the charging order, entitled to demand payment to himself of the amount of costs found due to him by Mr Welsh, and could have given a good receipt for it, but Messrs Eldred & Bignold, in virtue of their particular lien for costs in that action, might, at any time while the money remained unpaid, have given notice to Mr Welsh not to pay to Colonel North, and if after such notice Mr Welsh had paid to Colonel North, he might have been compelled to pay again to Messrs Eldred & Bignold.” In a subsequent passage of the opinion he says,—“I am of opinion that the charging order of 13th June 1887 conferred a valid title upon Messrs Eldred & Bignold under the statute, and that such charging order had a retrospective effect,” and in the last place there is this important passage,—“I am of opinion that the charging order converted the inchoate right of Messrs Eldred & Bignold at common law into an actual charge, and made them the owners in equity of the sum due from Mr Welsh to the extent of their claim against Colonel North.”

What then, according to the law of England, was the right of North at the date of the arrestment by Stewart. I think the answer to that question is, that it was a defeasible right. If the arrestee had paid to North before the date of the charging order, the discharge he would have obtained for the money from North would have been quite good, but until payment was actually made the right was defeasible, and being defeasible, it was defeated by the charging order, and the intimation of it. The arresting creditor could not by his arrestment obtain any higher right than the debtor to him, Colonel North, had. If North had assigned the claim to a third party, his assignee would in that case have had no higher right than the cedent or assignor himself had to give. The right of the assignee would have still been defeasible. As North's right was defeasible, and by the law of England was defeated by the charging order, I think that the Lord Ordinary's right, and that Eldred & Bignold have a preferable claim.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT adhered to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

Bulloch.

Succession—Testament—Falsa demonstratio—Direction to pay—Trust.—A trustor, by his trust-disposition and settlement, directed his trustees to pay or make over to each of three of his daughters one-fifth share of the residue and remainder of his means and estate, "the said shares to be at the absolute disposal of my said three daughters respectively." By subsequent codicil he "revoked and altered" his settlement "to this extent, that, in place of the absolute power therein given to" his three daughters, "I restrict that absolute power in each case to one half of their respective shares of my heritable estate, and in respect of the other half none of them shall have power to deal with it during their respective lifetime, beyond the interest or revenue derived from it; but they shall have power, by any deed or writing duly executed by them, to will the same over after their death to such person or persons or such objects as they may think proper, my object in making this restriction being that they shall not by any act on their part deprive themselves of a fair livelihood during their lifetime."

The trustor's moveable estate amounted to £175,000, and his heritable estate to £8000. In a special case between the trustees and the three daughters held (1) that the words "shares of my heritable estate" applied to shares of the testator's whole estate whether heritable or moveable; and (2) that as there was a clear direction to the trustees in the trust settlement to pay over the daughters' shares, and as that direction was not recalled, and no machinery was provided for carrying out the provisions of the codicil, the trustees were not entitled to hold any part of the shares,—diss. Lord Adam, who was of opinion that the terms of the codicil amounted to a revocation of the direction to pay over as regards one half of each daughter's share, and an implied direction to hold that half for her in liferent, and on her death to pay the fee as she may have directed.

PETER CLOUSTON, insurance broker, Glasgow, died on 30th August 1888, survived by four daughters, viz., Mrs Hannah Bulloch, wife of James Bulloch; Mrs Maria Bulloch, wife of Matthew Bulloch; Miss Christian and Miss Elizabeth Keir Clouston. 1ST DIVISION.
C.

He left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 31st December 1883 (under which Mr James Bulloch and others were appointed trustees), and various codicils, of which one was dated 29th November 1886.

The value of his moveable estate was about £175,000, and of his heritable estate, including his house in Glasgow, about £8000.

By the third purpose of his trust-disposition he directed his trustees to allow his unmarried daughters, Christian and Elizabeth, the liferent of his house in Glasgow, under certain conditions.

The fourth purpose contained, inter alia, the following clauses:—"In the fourth place, my trustees shall from time to time, as the same comes to be realised, divide the whole residue and remainder of my means and estate (including sums or property retained to meet annuities or liferent interests, or otherwise, as the same fall in) into five equal parts or shares, and hold and dispose thereof in manner following:— . . . (Second) Subject to the said provisions and the deductions after mentioned, my trustees shall pay or make over one of the said fifth shares of the said residue and remainder of my means and estate to each of my three daughters, Mrs Maria Clouston or Bulloch, wife of the said Matthew Bulloch, and the said Miss Christian or Christina Clouston and Elizabeth Keir Clouston, respectively (being three fifth shares in all), the said shares, so far as available, to be paid or made over as soon as conveniently may be after my decease, and the remainder to be paid or made over as and when the same becomes available, the said shares to be at the absolute disposal of my said three daughters respectively."

He further provided that each of his unmarried daughters, so long as they should remain unmarried, should have an income of at least £1200 per annum, and that if the income of their shares of the residue fell short of that amount, the trustees should retain in their hands such a sum out of the shares falling to his married daughter and the children of a daughter who had predeceased them as would bring up their income to that amount.

The codicil of 29th November 1886 was in the following terms:—"After serious and mature consideration, and reflecting on the uncertainty of circumstances which may happen, I hereby revoke and alter the clause named (second) on twenty-third line of page sixth in my trust-disposition or settlement, to this extent, that, in place of the absolute power therein given to my daughters Maria, Christina, and Elizabeth, I restrict that absolute power in each case to one half of their respective shares of my heritable estate, and in respect of the other half none of them shall have power to deal with it during their respective lifetime beyond the interest or revenue derived from it; but they shall have power, by any deed or writing duly executed by them, to will the same over after their death to such person or persons or such objects as they may think proper, my object in making this restriction being that they shall not by any act on their part deprive themselves of a fair livelihood during their lifetime."

Questions having arisen as to the effect of that codicil, a special case was presented to the Court, to which Mr Clouston's trustees were the first parties, and Mrs Maria Bulloch and the Misses Christina and Elizabeth Clouston the second parties.

The first parties contended that the truster had by his codicil of 29th November 1886 restricted the absolute right in their respective shares of residue conferred on his three daughters Maria (Mrs Bulloch), Christina, and Elizabeth, by the said trust-disposition and settlement, to a liferent as regards one-half thereof, and that the trustees were bound to retain the half of such shares for behoof of these ladies in liferent, and subject to their power of disposal by will, but not otherwise.

The second parties contended that the codicil of 29th November 1886 was void from repugnancy, and, alternatively, that it applied only to the heritable or real estate of the truster.

The following questions were submitted for the opinion and judgment of the Court:—"1. Are the first parties, as Mr Clouston's trustees, bound by the codicil dated 29th November 1886 to hold one half of the shares of the whole residue of the truster's estate, given by the clause named (second) of the fourth purpose of his trust-disposition and settlement to his daughters Maria (Mrs Bulloch), Christina, and Elizabeth, for behoof of these ladies in liferent, subject to a power of disposal by will only of their respective shares? or, 2. Are the said trustees bound by the trust-disposition and settlement, and the codicil of 29th November 1886, to hold only one half of the heritable or real estate of the truster for behoof of the said three daughters in liferent, subject to their power of disposal by will only, and to pay or make over their respective shares of the whole moveable estate, as well as the other half of the heritable estate, to the said three daughters in the manner directed by the clause named (second) of the fourth head or direction of the trust-disposition and settlement? or, 3. Is the codicil of 29th November 1886 void on the ground of uncertainty? or, 4. Are the first parties, as Mr Clouston's trustees, bound and entitled by the trust-disposition and settlement and codicil of 29th November 1886 to hold any part of the shares of the moveable or heritable estate of the truster, or are they bound to pay and make over said shares, or any, or what part thereof, to Maria (Mrs Bulloch), Christina, and Elizabeth, the truster's three daughters, and, if so, on what terms?"

No. 169.
July 5, 1889.
Clouston's
Bulloch.

Argued for the first parties;—The evident intention of the testator, as shewn by the trust-settlement and codicil, was that his unmarried daughters should have a good income on which to live in the house in Glasgow, and that they should not have the power of depriving themselves of it. That could not be insured unless the words "shares of my heritable estate" in the codicil were read as meaning "shares of the whole estate to be inherited" by the daughters, as the interest of one half of each daughter's share of heritage would be very small indeed. The suggested meaning of the word "heritable" was sanctioned by authority (cf. Johnson's and Webster's Dictionaries), but if that meaning was not to be adopted, then the word should be struck out altogether as being at variance with the general intention of the truster. When such was the case, the Court would go directly in the teeth of the words used in the deed.<sup>1</sup> The words of the codicil amounted to a revocation of the direction to pay over in the trust-deed. To carry out the intention of tying up one half of each daughter's share there was no necessity to create a trust; the existing trust was sufficient for the purpose.<sup>2</sup> The trust here did not exist for one purpose only, as was the case in Allan's Trustees,<sup>3</sup> but had to continue for other purposes, so that machinery to enable the trustees to carry out the truster's intention was ready to hand. There was no uncertainty in the legal sense in the words of the codicil—neither the subject nor the object of the clause was doubtful.

Argued for the second parties;—There was no case in which the Court had gone so far as to read "heritable" as meaning "moveable," or mixed heritable and moveable estate. Such a reading would amount to making a new will for the testator. Further, the trustees were not entitled to hold any part of the estate. There was a distinct direction to pay over in the settlement, and that was never recalled. The revocation of such a direction must be as clear as the direction itself. In such cases where there was a direction to pay over, and no revocation of the direction and no machinery provided by which the trustees could hold instead of pay over, it was clearly settled that the intention that a part or the whole of the provision should be tied up was of no effect.<sup>4</sup> The testator had attempted a legal impossibility, viz., to direct that money should be paid over, and yet that it should not be at the disposal of the beneficiary. To carry out any such intention a trust was required.

are, first, the provisions in the principal deed in favour of his three daughters, Maria, Christian, and Elizabeth, and second, the alterations on those provisions introduced by the codicil of 29th November 1886. In the fourth purpose of his original settlement the testator expresses himself thus :—“(Second), Subject to the said provisions and the deductions after mentioned, my trustees shall pay or make over one of the said fifth shares of the said residue and remainder of my means and estate to each of my three daughters, Mrs Maria Clouston or Bulloch, wife of the said Matthew Bulloch, and the said Miss Christian or Christina Clouston, and Elizabeth Keir Clouston respectively (being three fifth shares in all), the said shares, so far as available, to be paid or made over as soon as conveniently may be after my decease, and the remainder to be paid or made over as and when the same becomes available, the said shares to be at the absolute disposal of my said three daughters respectively.” That is a conveyance which the trustees are to make to the beneficiaries in absolute property, the payment being to be made immediately after the truster's death, so far as funds are available, and so far as funds are not available then as soon as they become available. To emphasise his meaning the testator adds these unnecessary words at the end of the clause, “the said shares to be at the absolute disposal of my said three daughters respectively.”

Now, in the codicil the truster expresses himself thus :—“After serious and mature consideration and reflecting on the uncertainty of circumstances which may happen, I hereby revoke and alter the clause named (second) on twenty-third line of page sixth in my trust-disposition or settlement to this extent, that, in place of the absolute power therein given to my daughters, Maria, Christina, and Elizabeth, I restrict that absolute power in each case to one half of their respective shares of my heritable estate, and in respect of the other half none of them shall have power to deal with it during their respective lifetime beyond the interest or revenue derived from it, but they shall have power by any deed or writing duly executed by them to will the same over after their death to such person or persons or such objects as they may think proper, my object in making this restriction being that they shall not by any act on their part deprive themselves of a fair livelihood during their lifetime.” Now, the part of the truster's property dealt with by that codicil, taking its words literally, is his heritable estate. That consists of a house (his own residence) in Glasgow, which he arranges in his settlement is to be occupied by his unmarried daughters, and also of another property of which the value does not exceed £2000. Thus, if these ladies were to be restricted only as regards each one's share of the heritable property the effect of this codicil would be very slight, so slight that it is difficult to believe that that could be the meaning of the testator. Indeed, there are several circumstances which appear on the face of the codicil which point to a different result so strongly that it is impossible to resist the conclusion that the truster did not intend that this codicil should be restricted in its operation to his heritable estate only, but intended it to affect moveable property as well.

The first observation which occurs to me is, that the truster speaks of his daughters' respective shares of his heritable estate, but the subject with which he deals in the original settlement is not shares of heritable estate, but shares of the residue of his means and estate. He dealt with his estate as a mixed estate, and the shares were shares of a mixed moveable and heritable estate.

In the next place, the utterly futile character of the restriction, if the codicil is read according to the strict meaning of the words, gives rise to the gravest doubts whether that strict meaning can be what the testator intended, particularly as the object of the whole codicil is to make sure that the daughters "shall not by any act on their part deprive themselves of a fair livelihood during their lifetime." Now, if they were entitled to spend everything they had just as they liked, except one-half of their shares of the heritable estate, they might very easily, notwithstanding the provisions of the codicil, reduce themselves to absolute poverty. The notion which the truster had of what was a proper income for his unmarried daughters may be gathered from the fact that elsewhere in his settlement he says that they shall not have less than £1200 each per annum, and to insure that they shall have that income, he burdens the shares falling to his married daughters with the amount necessary to make up that sum, should the shares specially given to the unmarried daughters produce an income of less amount. The views therefore of the truster with regard to what was a proper income for his unmarried daughters were largely in excess of the revenue produced by one-half of his heritable estate.

But further, all the other expressions of the codicil tend to the same result. A power is given to these daughters to deal in their wills with the one-half share in question, but during their lifetimes they cannot deal with it "beyond the interest or revenue derived from it," that is, derived from the half he wished to tie up. Now, "interest or revenue" is not the proper way to speak of income derived from heritable estate, such income is almost always spoken of as rent, whereas "interest or revenue" is peculiarly applicable to moveable estate.

These considerations lead me to the conclusion that there has been a palpable mistake in the use of the word "heritable," a mistake so palpable as to entitle the Court to hold that the truster intended to write "their respective shares of my whole estate." The result of giving effect to this view would be that these daughters would have an absolute power of disposal of one half of their provisions under the settlement, but that as regards the other half, they would be tied up in such a way that they could not spend the capital but only the income, though they might dispose of the capital by will.

That, I think, was the intention of the testator, but the question remains, has he provided the machinery requisite for carrying out his intention? The original deed directs the trustees to pay over the shares without any qualification, and that direction has never been recalled. In these circumstances, it is difficult to see what the trustees can do but pay over the money absolutely. There is no direction to them to hold this part of the estate, and the distinction between holding and paying over the estate was constantly in the mind of the testator throughout the deed. To make this restriction, which was evidently the truster's intention, operative, it would require that some means should be given to the trustees to enable them to carry it out, and where, as here, there is a direction to pay over, and no direction to hold, I do not see how trustees can hold and refuse to pay over.

If the question was one dependent entirely upon principle, and was now presented for decision for the first time, I should think it a matter of the highest importance, and should be inclined to consult the other Judges; but it has been expressly decided that where a truster has provided no machinery for carrying out such an intention as this, the intention cannot receive effect. That was decided in the case of Allan's Trustees (11 Macph. 216), which was before the other Division of the Court in 1872. In that case a testator directed his trustees to pay and make over the fee of the residue of his estate to and among his whole children, "declaring that the provisions therein made in favour of females shall be purely alimentary to them, and not alienable or assignable, and shall be exclusive of the jus mariti and right of administration of husbands, and not affectable by their own or such husband's debts or deeds." It was there held that as there was a clear direction to the trustees to pay to the beneficiaries, who were alone interested, and as the Court could not consistently therewith create a trust, which was the only mode of rendering the daughters' provisions inalienable, the daughters were entitled to receive payment on their own receipts. The Court, however, in order to give effect so far as possible to the testator's intentions, directed that the receipts should bear an exclusion of the jus mariti and right of administration. Whether that would have any practical effect the Court did not say, but they at least paid that respect to the testator's intention.

The ground of judgment in that case is very clearly set forth in the opinions of the Lord Justice-Clerk and Lord Cowan. The former says,—“If this condition had related to a sum payable annually it would perhaps have been proper that the Court should exercise its equitable jurisdiction for the purpose of carrying into effect such an intention. But in the present case I do not think this is practicable. The testator has attempted to do two inconsistent things. He has ordered his trustees to pay over, while he has endeavoured to limit the full right of property in the payees, and that without a trust, and without creating a separate or resulting right in anyone else.” Lord Cowan says,—“Mr Bell in his Commentaries, and other writers, lay it down that effectual protection for a fund left by a father to his children can only be obtained by means of a trust; and the question here raised comes in effect to be whether we are to create a trust in order to carry out the conditions which Mr Allan annexed to his daughter's provisions. I am not aware of the Court having ever exercised such power. I think we are not entitled to authorise the trustees to do otherwise than the testator has directed, which is to pay the money directly to the beneficiaries.” In that decision Lord Benholme and Lord Neaves concurred. Now, that is a very weighty decision, and I should be little disposed to dispute its soundness standing by itself. It was, however, followed by the case of M. V. v. Donald's Trustees (7 R. 96). I need not notice that case at any length, because it follows precisely on Allan's Trustees, but I may merely say that the Judges composing the Court in this case were not the same as those who decided Allan's Trustees, which of course makes the judicial concurrence of opinion on the point all the stronger.

Another case which was not cited in the arguments involved a recognition by this Division of the doctrine laid down in Allan's case, viz., the case of Douglas's Trustees v. Kay's Trustees (7 R. 295), where by her antenuptial marriage-contract a lady, who was a minor, with consent of her father disposed to trustees the whole estate belonging or which should belong or accrue to her during the subsistence of the marriage. Her father thereafter by his settlement gave her a share of the residue of his estate as her absolute property, and directed that it should not fall under the conveyance in her marriage-contract, and should be exclusive of the husband's rights, and he authorised his trustees “to take such steps as they may think necessary or proper for giving effect to the provision and declaration.” The father there foresaw that if the money came into the wife's hands it would fall into the power of the marriage-contract trustees, and he thought that if he gave the directions I have mentioned to his trustees he might succeed in preventing that. But he had not, as the Court held, taken the proper means to effect his purpose, because there being a clear direction to the trustees to pay over the money to the daughter, it was held that as the father's settlement conferred on his daughter an absolute right to the property and possession of the share of residue, the declaration that it should not fall under the conveyance in the antenuptial marriage-contract was ineffectual.

Clouston's
Bulloch.

The reasons which I assigned for the judgment I shall take the liberty to explain by a short quotation from my opinion. I say, speaking of the father,—“He says to his trustees, ‘Do all you can to prevent the fund from falling under the marriage-contract trust, but do so in a way consistent with giving Mrs Douglas an absolute fee and full power of disposal of the fund.’ Now, the question is whether that could effectually be done, whether he could give her a full power of disposal and yet exclude the operation of the marriage-contract trust. I do not doubt that it might have been done by creating a trust with a direction to pay the income to Mrs Douglas during her marriage for her alimentary use only, or by some provision of that kind. But then the fee would not be in Mrs Douglas, but in the trustees, and whether Mrs Douglas and her marriage-contract trustees would have been inclined to accept such a provision in place of her legal rights would have been for them to consider. But in the case here which we have actually to consider there is nothing more than a declaration of will and intention by the testator. He does not give any power, and does not give any authority by which his trustees can do what he wishes. They could not create a subordinate trust at their own hand; that is well settled by the case of Allan's Trustees (11 Macph. 216), nor could they continue to hold the money themselves, for they are directed to pay it over to Mrs Douglas as soon as the state of the trust permitted. The father desired that the money should not pass into the hands of the marriage-contract trustees. But what has that to do with the question? Could it be said for one moment that he could by a mere expression of intention exclude the diligence of his daughter's creditors? As I said before, this is a most onerous obligation by Mrs Douglas. She is personally bound just as if she had contracted a debt by borrowing so much money. Therefore I think that there is no answer to the demand of the marriage-contract trustees.

“I may put the question in this way: Was Mrs Douglas not entitled if she chose to give the money to the marriage-contract trustees? It would be very difficult to answer that question in the negative. She had full power of disposal; she could give the money to whom she pleased, including these trustees, and if she had the power was she not also under an obligation to give it?” The rest of the Court, with the exception of Lord Deas, agreed in that opinion. Now, that case appears to me to involve a full recognition by this Division of the authority of the case of Allan's Trustees, and the principle embodied therein. The application of the principle to the present case is too clear to require explanation.

I am therefore of opinion that though the intention of the testator in this codicil was to tie up one-half of his daughters' shares, he has not effectually done so, not having provided means whereby his intention may be carried into effect.

LORD MURE.—On the first question raised by this case which relates to the meaning of the codicil I have never felt much difficulty. Looking at its terms generally, I think it is clear that the testator's intention was to restrict his daughters' right in the provisions made for them by the settlement to the extent of giving them an absolute right over one-half only of their provision, while as regards the other half they were to have a life interest only of their shares, and an absolute power of disposal of the fee. The testator however in making the codicil has used the expression "shares of my heritable estate," and the use of the word "heritable" has given rise to a difficulty, viz., whether the testator intended to make a change with regard to the half of the whole of each provision, or only with regard to the half of that part of the provisions which consisted of heritage.

Clouston's
Bulloch.

In the circumstances of the case, where the moveable estate of which the residue consists is large, and the heritable very small, it is plain that the object of the testator in making the change, as distinctly explained by him in the codicil, could never have been effected if the heritable estate only was to be dealt with, for the income of the half of each daughter's share of that part of the residue would have been so small as not to exceed the wages of a superior servant. It is quite clear to me therefore that the term "heritable estate" was used unintentionally, and that what the testator was really dealing with was each daughter's share of the whole residue, whether it consisted of heritable or of moveable estate. I am, therefore, of opinion that we are entitled to construe the codicil as applying to each daughter's share of the whole provision given to her.

But it is at this point that to my mind the whole difficulty of the case begins, for the testator has not, I think, provided machinery by which this intention can be carried into effect. On this question, I find myself in the same position with your Lordship, having regard to the decisions in Allan's Trustees and others which have been mentioned. If we had been free to deal with this as an entirely new question, I should have been disposed to endeavour to adopt some means by which the testator's intention could be effectually carried out, for he has not, I think, provided any himself. But your Lordship has drawn attention to various cases in which it has been held that where there is a direction to trustees to pay over a sum of money absolutely to a beneficiary no qualification of the kind here sought to be imposed can be made operative unless something of the nature of a trust has been interposed. The Court cannot of its own accord, as I understand those decisions, make a trust to carry out the intention of a testator. I am therefore of opinion that the trustees are now bound to pay over their whole provisions to the truster's daughters.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion on both points. I think that in the interpretation of the settlement and codicil nothing can be plainer than this, that the term "heritable estate" did not in the mind of the testator mean heritable property as opposed to personal. I have nothing to add as to the grounds on which I have reached that conclusion, as your Lordship has already exhausted them. Taking it then on that assumption, it appears to me that the term as used in this codicil must apply to estate generally whether heritable or moveable, and I think that Mr Graham in his argument has afforded a means of giving effect to the testator's intention without doing violence to the language of the codicil, for I think that though the word "heritable," in its most common sense, means heritage as opposed to moveable property, yet there is another and quite proper meaning of the term. In Johnson's Dictionary one meaning which is expressly given to the word is "whatever may be inherited," and if that be one meaning of the word, and if by giving it that meaning we can give effect to the testator's plain intention, then I think we are entitled to give it that meaning.

No. 169.

July 5, 1889.
Clouston's
Bulloch.

Again, in Webster's Dictionary, I find that the first meaning of the word is "capable of inheriting or taking by descent," but the second is "that may be inherited," and it is added that this last is the true sense of the term. Now, if here we substitute that phrase for "heritable estate" as it occurs in the codicil, then the words of the codicil correctly set forth the intention of the testator. On this ground I have no difficulty in construing the codicil as applying to moveable as well as to heritable estate, and I think that in doing so we do no violence to its language.

On the other point raised by the case I feel no difficulty. It is clear that in the original settlement there is an absolute direction to the trustees to pay over the daughters' shares to them, and I find nothing in the codicil which could have the effect of withdrawing that direction. I doubt whether such a direction could be withdrawn by inference—indeed I am of opinion that where such a direction is clearly stated you must find in some subsequent deed, or clause of the original deed, an equally clear direction to the trustees to hold the shares if an intention to that effect is to be operative. Here the direction in the original deed is "to pay or make over" the shares "as soon as conveniently may be after my decease," while in the codicil with respect to one-half of each daughter's share it is provided that none of the daughters shall have power to deal with their shares during their respective lifetimes beyond the interest or revenue derived from it, but shall have power to dispose of it in their wills. Now, can we read those words as equivalent to a direction to the trustees not to pay over the shares but to continue to hold them until the death of the daughters? I cannot so read them, and I do not think that the Court is entitled to put any such meaning on the words of the codicil. The testator may have thought that these conditions would attach even in the hands of the legatees, but if he did so think he was in error. I think that we are not entitled to add so material an element to the settlement and codicil, and that if we did so we should be going entirely contrary to the class of cases referred to by your Lordship, to which I may add the case of Gibson's Trustees v. Ross (4 R. 1038).

LORD ADAM.—On the first point I concur with your Lordship, and have nothing to add, but I have arrived at a different conclusion on the second point, namely, whether or not these one-half shares are to be paid over to the beneficiaries absolutely. Of course, I do not differ as to the law applicable to the case, for I am bound to recognise the law as laid down in the cases of Allan, Lady Massey's Trustees, and others, but I differ on the construction of this codicil. I think that the effect of that deed is to destroy and sweep away altogether the direction to pay over which occurs in the original settlement as regards one-half of the shares.

The question here must be settled, like all questions of this nature, by reference to the intention of the testator, and his intention must be given effect to, unless he has expressed his intention in such a way that it cannot, for defect of machinery or otherwise, be given effect to in law.

Now, here I think the testator's intention appears clearly from the terms of the codicil, and if so, the trustees are bound to give effect to it. In the

No. 169.

Clouston's
Bulloch.

second clause of the fourth purpose of the settlement the testator directs his trustees to pay and make over his daughters' shares as soon after his death as conveniently may be, and to be at their absolute disposal. In the codicil he revokes and alters "the clause named (second)" in his settlement to the extent that "in place of the absolute power therein given to my daughters . . . . I restrict that absolute power in each case to one-half of their respective shares of my heritable estate,"—that is to say, one half of each share is left to be paid over absolutely as directed in the settlement; and then the codicil goes on to give directions as to the disposal of the other half, thereby altering or revoking the directions of the settlement. It proceeds, "and in respect of the other half, none of them shall have power to deal with it during their respective lifetime, beyond the interest or revenue derived from it," but power is given to them to leave it, by will, to such person or persons as they may think proper. I think nothing can be clearer than that the intention was that the daughters were to have only the liferent of this half share, and that the fee was to be paid "after their death to such person or persons or such objects as they [the daughters] may think proper." If that is so, it appears to me that it goes directly to the root of the direction to pay over, for if the fee of this one-half share is only to be given to such persons as the daughters think proper, and name in their wills, that necessarily implies an alteration of the direction to pay it over absolutely to them. In short, I think the whole directions as to disposal of this half share are to be found in the codicil. That being so, I do not think the case falls under the decision in the cases of Allan or Douglas, for I think there is no absolute direction to pay over the fee to the daughters; the direction is to pay it over to such persons as the daughters may think proper. That is the distinction between this case and those I have named. In them there was a distinct direction to the trustees to pay over the fee to the beneficiaries.

Now, in those cases what was decided was this, that where there was such a direction to pay over you could not qualify or limit the right of property so conferred except by the interposition of something of the nature of a trust. Now, I quite agree in that statement of the law, but I hold that here the effect of this codicil is to give a direction to the trustees not to pay over the fee of these half shares to the daughters, but only the liferent. If that be so, is there any want of machinery to carry out the directions? I think not, for if I am right in saying that the testator has expressed his intention that the fee shall only be paid over after the daughters' deaths, then there is an implied direction to the trustees to hold the shares till that event occurred. There was, in short, an existing and continuing trust to hold for the daughters in liferent, and then to pay over the fee as they might direct. That is my construction of this codicil, and I do not think it conflicts with the case of Allan for the reason I have already stated.

I may say that so far as I know in all the previous cases the direction was to pay over the fee, but here the direction is to give only the liferent. That is a distinction to which the Lord Justice-Clerk called attention in Allan's case as a case which might possibly call for the intervention of the Court to give effect to the direction. But here, I think, we have existing machinery by which effect may quite easily be given to the intention of the testator. I am sorry to dissent from the decision of your Lordships, but this is the reading which I feel constrained to give to the codicil.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that No. 169. the first parties, as Mr Clouston's trustees, are not bound or entitled by the codicil dated 29th November 1886, to hold any part of the shares of the residue of the truster's estate, given by the clause named (second) of the fourth purpose of his trust-disposition and settlement to his daughters Maria (Mrs Bulloch), Christian, and Elizabeth for behoof of these ladies in liferent, subject to a power of disposal by will only of their respective shares, but that the said trustees are bound to pay over the whole of the said shares to the said Maria, Christian, and Elizabeth, and decern."

Bankruptcy—Sequestration—Affidavit—Verity of debt—Constitution anew of notour bankruptcy on same debt after four months—Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856 (19 and 20 Vict. c. 79), secs. 9, 15, and 22.—A debtor was charged in July 1888 by the assignees to a debt to make payment thereof. On failure to pay, his estates were sequestered, but in January 1889 the sequestration was recalled in respect of an informality in the oath of the petitioning creditor. On 17th January he was charged of new on the same debt, and on his failure to pay the creditor again petitioned for sequestration. The oath produced with the petition bore that the debtor "was justly indebted and resting owing" to the creditor the amount of the debt, and that "no part of said sum has been paid or compensated." Sequestration having been awarded, the debtor petitioned for recall on the grounds (1) that the oath was disconform to the requirements of section 22 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856,* in respect it did not set forth in terms that the debt had not been paid either to the cedent or to the assignee, and (2) that the petition for sequestration was incompetent under sections 9 and 15 of the Act, in respect it was presented more than four months from the commencement of notour bankruptcy in July 1888. The Court refused the prayer of the petition.

In October 1886 Messrs Scott & Gray, solicitors, Dundee, obtained Bill-Chamber. decree in two actions in the Sheriff Court of Dundee, at their instance, 1st Division. against William Blair, bookseller there, for £65, 18s. 1d. and £47, 7s. 11½d. Ld. Kyllachy. M.

In February 1888 Messrs Scott & Gray assigned their rights under the decrees to the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company.

In June 1888 the insurance company charged Blair to pay the sums contained in the decrees.

Blair having failed to pay, the insurance company presented a petition to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills praying for sequestration of his estates, and sequestration was awarded on 18th August 1888.

* Section 21 provides that the petitioning creditor shall produce with his petition an oath "to the effect hereinafter provided."

No. 170.

 Blair v. North
 British and

 Insurance Co.

On 8th January 1889 the sequestration was recalled in respect of an informality in the petitioning creditor's oath (see Blair v. North British and Mercantile Insurance Company, Jan. 8, 1889, supra, p. 325).

New charges on the decrees were thereafter given (without the former charges being withdrawn) on 17th January, and Blair having again failed to pay the debt, sequestration was awarded on 31st January, on the petition of the insurance company.

Blair thereafter presented a petition to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills (Kyllachy), praying for recall of the sequestration, on the grounds, inter alia, (1) that the oath of the petitioning creditor was disconform to the requirements of secs. 21 and 22 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, in respect that it did not set forth in terms that the debt had not been paid to Messrs Scott & Gray, the cedents in the assignation, in virtue of which the insurance company had petitioned for sequestration.* (2) That the sequestration was incompetent under secs. 9 and 15 of the statute, in respect that the petition was presented more than four months from the commencement of notour bankruptcy in July 1888 when the first charges were given.†

The insurance company opposed the prayer of the petition.

On 4th June the Lord Ordinary refused the petition.‡

* The oath bore that the debtor "is justly indebted and resting owing to the said North British and Mercantile Insurance Company" the sum in question, and further, "that no part of said sum has been paid or compensated."

† Sec. 9 provides that "notour bankruptcy shall be held to commence from the time when its several requisites concur, and when it has once been constituted shall continue in case of a sequestration till the debtor shall obtain his discharge, and in other cases till insolvency cease, without prejudice to notour bankruptcy being anew constituted within such period."

Sec. 15 provides that "petitions for sequestration presented without the concurrence of the debtor shall be competent only within four months of the date of the debtor's notour bankruptcy."

‡ "OPINION.—The recall of the sequestration is sought upon various grounds, some of which have been considered by my predecessor, but on none of which a final judgment has been pronounced. I have therefore considered the questions raised as still open, and have heard a full argument upon them. . . .

"(2) The second ground of recall is rested upon an objection to the terms of the petitioning creditors' oath, which is said to be disconform to the statute as interpreted by certain decisions, viz., Taylor v. Drummond, 10 D. 335; Glen v. Borthwick, 11 D. 387. The debt of the petitioning creditors is, as before mentioned, constituted by two decrees of the Sheriff Court of Dundee, to which the petitioning creditors have obtained an assignation. The objection is, that the oath did not set forth in terms that the sum in the decrees had not been paid either to the assignees or to the cedent. In point of fact, the oath is in general terms, and simply sets out that the debt in question is due to the petitioning creditors, the decrees and assignation being produced to the Justices of the Peace; but the oath itself not going into particulars. My opinion is that this objection is not well founded. The statute does not require that the oath shall set forth more than that the particular debt is justly due (secs. 21 and 22), and the oath in the present case, in my opinion, sufficiently complies with the statute. No doubt it has been held that where the petitioning creditors' title to the debt depends upon an assignation, and the oath proceeds on the principle of narrating first the constitution of the debt and then its transmissions, and then proceeds to aver non-payment, it is necessary that the averment of non-payment shall apply both to the deponent and to the previous creditors. In other words, there must be no doubt upon the face of the oath that the petitioning creditor depones that the debt is due, and due to him. But each of the cases referred to proceeded on its own specialties, and they do not

The petitioner reclaimed, and argued ;—(1) The title of the petitioning No. 170. creditors depended on the assignation, and when that was the case it was necessary that the oath should bear in so many words that the debt was resting owing, and that payment had not been made either to the cedent or to the assignee.<sup>1</sup> Here it only bore that the debt was resting owing, and that payment had not been made to the assignee. [LORD PRESIDENT. —I think that all that the statute requires is. that the deponent shall swear that the debt is resting owing. The addition of anything else in regard to the verity of the debt is superfluous and dangerous.] (2) The petition was incompetent under section 15 of the Act in respect that more than four months had elapsed since the date of notour bankruptcy, i.e. July 1888, when the first charges were given. The 9th section of the Act provided that notour bankruptcy should commence from the time when its several requisites concurred, and should continue in case of a sequestration till the discharge of the debtor, and in other cases till insolvency ceased, neither of which had taken place here. The declaration at the end of that section that the continuance of notour bankruptcy should be “without prejudice to notour bankruptcy being anew constituted within such period,” referred to its constitution at the instance of another creditor, or in respect of a different debt.

July 10, 1889.
Blair v. North British and Mercantile Insurance Co.

The argument of the respondents sufficiently appears from the opinion of the Lord Ordinary.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary on the different questions raised in this case.

With regard to the second objection referred to by his Lordship, I must say that I should not like to hold the two cases of Taylor v. Drummond and Glen v. Borthwick as binding authorities. They have both been questioned, and appear to me to have laid down any rule which is applicable to the present case.

“(3) The third and only other objection to the sequestration was one founded upon the provisions of sections 9 and 15 of the Bankruptcy Act, which relate to the commencement of notour bankruptcy and the date of presenting the petition for sequestration. It appears that the petitioner was rendered notour bankrupt so far back as July 1888, in virtue of a charge following on the decrees above referred to, and that sequestration followed on 28th August 1888, but was subsequently, on 8th January 1889, recalled by the Court in respect of an informality in the oath. New charges were thereafter given on 17th January, and notour bankruptcy being thus constituted anew, the present sequestration was awarded on 31st January 1889. The objection is that this sequestration was incompetent in respect that it was dated more than four months from the commencement of notour bankruptcy in July 1888. It appears to me that it is a sufficient answer to this objection that while the 9th section of the statute provides that ‘notour bankruptcy shall be held to commence from the time when its several requisites concur, and when it has once been constituted shall continue in case of a sequestration till the debtor shall obtain his discharge, and in other cases until insolvency cease,’ it is at the same time expressly declared that all this shall be ‘without prejudice to notour bankruptcy being anew constituted within such period.’ It seems to me that this provision was expressly designed to meet cases like the present. Reference may be made to Balfour v. Pedie, 3 D. 612, where a similar question was raised under the previous Bankruptcy Statutes.

“On the whole, I am of opinion that no grounds exist for recalling the sequestration, and I therefore refuse the petition, with expenses.”

No. 170. doubts have been cast upon them for good reasons.<sup>1</sup> But apart from that, it seems to me that the oath here is a perfectly good one as an oath of verity, and contains all that is required by the 22d section of the Bankruptcy Statute. There are certain other things prescribed as necessary to be mentioned in the oath where they actually occur, but in this case none of these exist. The oath sets forth that the debtor is "justly indebted and resting owing" to the creditor the amount of the debt, and that "no part of said sum has been paid or compensated."

July 10, 1889.
Blair v. North British and Mercantile
Insurance Co.

There is no room for saying that that is not a perfectly good oath of verity—that is to say, it affirms that the debt is resting owing, which is all that the statute requires.

On the third question there is no necessity for me to add anything. It is perfectly clear that the objection is bad.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion, and have nothing to add to the Lord Ordinary's views.

LORD SHAND.—I concur. I think the Lord Ordinary's judgment altogether sound.

I agree with your Lordship that the cases of Taylor v. Drummond and Glen v. Borthwick are doubtful authorities, and would not in my opinion be followed in modern times.

LORD ADAM concurred.

Income-Tax.

Revenue—Income-tax—Railway—Expenditure on permanent improvements.
—A railway company, in making their return for assessment of income-tax, claimed as deductions from the revenue of the year of assessment (1) a sum expended upon the improvement of the permanent way of a line of railway which they had acquired and amalgamated with their concern, in order to bring it up to the standard of the rest of the line; (2) a sum representing the cost of the extra weight in relaying part of the main line with steel in place of iron rails, and with chairs of additional weight. In the books of the company, these sums were charged against capital. The Commissioners of Income-tax disallowed the sums as deductions from revenue, holding that they were properly chargeable to capital. On appeal, the Court affirmed their determination.

THE Highland Railway Company, in making their return for income-tax under schedule D for the year 1888-9, based on the profits of the preceding year, as shewn by their printed accounts for the two half years ended 31st August 1887 and 29th February 1888, claimed to deduct, in addition to the several items charged as the expenditure of the year in working the railway, the four sums of £9119, £755, £1555, and £878. These amounts were entered under the following heads in the accounts of the company for the half years ended 31st August 1887 and 29th February 1888:—

No. 171. Company contended that the sums represented the extra cost necessitated by the inferior condition of the permanent way of the original line, and also of the Caithness line, when amalgamated with the Highland Railway Company in 1884. The expenditure on the Caithness line was stated to represent the extra cost of relaying the lines over and above what would have been necessary to renew and relay the section as it was previous to the amalgamation.

July 10, 1889.
Highland Railway Co. v.
Special Commissioners of Income-Tax.

The Special Commissioners disallowed the deductions, on the ground that they were properly charged to capital, as shewn in the company's own printed accounts, and they added the amounts to the sum returned by the company's secretary.

The ground of the Commissioners' decision was that the expenditure was an improvement of the property, and chargeable to capital; and as regarded the Sutherland and Caithness section, that the purchase of that railway in an inferior condition would obviously affect the cost at which it was obtained.

The Highland Railway Company took a case, which was stated under the Taxes Management Act, 1881 (43 and 44 Vict. c. 19, sec. 59), and from which the preceding narrative is taken.

Argued for the Railway Company;—In determining the question it was of no consequence that for the purposes of the company, as between it and the shareholders, the sums had been charged in the company's books against capital. That was a matter of convenience merely. The sums ought, for purposes of assessment of income-tax, to be charged against income.<sup>1</sup> A reference to the appendix shewed that the sums expended on the Sutherland line were sums dealing purely with the maintenance and upkeep of the line. As regarded the main line, the mere fact that steel rails and not iron ones were used in connection with the repairs did not alter the character of the repairs. There was no such permanent improvement of the property as made these outlays a proper charge against capital. The company derived no additional revenue from these outlays, and they were thus a proper deduction from the revenue of the year.

Argued for the Commissioners;—The fact that the company had entered the sums in their books against capital was conclusive against them. They had done rightly in this, because the outlays had materially improved the permanent way, and made the company's property more valuable. As regarded the Sutherland section, the repairs on it must really be regarded as part of the cost of the undertaking, for that section was obviously acquired by the railway company owing to its inferior condition at a proportionately cheaper rate. As regarded the main line, the repairs were incontestibly of a permanent nature.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The sums which the appellants now propose to charge against income are in their own books charged against capital, and the reason why they say the charge should be made against income is, that it is really part of the proper annual expenses at the time. I do not know any other ground on which that could be maintained. By charging these sums against capital they have been able to bring out a much larger profit upon the line for the year, and so have been enabled to pay to their shareholders a much larger dividend than if those sums had been charged against income. One result of that would be that if their present argument were sustained the aggregate amount of income-tax which they deducted from their shareholders in paying their dividends would be much larger than the company would now pay to the Inland Revenue, and so a considerable balance of the income-tax upon the actual revenue of the company would remain in the pocket of the company itself. That would be a very anomalous result, but it is one of the results of their having entered those sums as charges against capital in their books instead of charging them against income. That, however, does not decide the case by any means, but if the respondents are right in their present contention it shews the extreme inconvenience of their keeping their books in such a way as to lead to anomalous results of that kind, and I think it is a pretty good indication to the Commissioners upon their part that they could not properly make it a charge against income at all. At the same time, though this is the condition of the appellants' books, I do not by any means say that that is conclusive, if they can shew that what they have made a charge against capital ought really to have been made a charge against income, and properly constitutes a charge against income; and, therefore, the question remains for consideration, whether these charges as described in their books could with any propriety be dealt with otherwise than they have been dealt with by themselves.

I take in the first place the portion of the sums in question which relate to the improvement or renewal of the Sutherland and Caithness section, "to bring it up to the standard of the rest of the main line," using the language of the appellants' books. Now this, of course, presupposes that in acquiring the property of the Sutherland and Caithness line the company were aware that they could not with any propriety use that line in connection with their main line without expending a good deal of money upon it, in order to bring it up to the standard of the rest of the main line. It appears to me therefore that they must have acquired this Sutherland and Caithness line at a lower figure than it would otherwise have brought, in consequence of its being in that imperfect condition; and, if that be so, it seems to follow of necessity that the renewal or improvement of this Sutherland and Caithness line, to bring it up to the proper standard, is just part of the cost of acquiring that line to work along with the main line. If it had been brought up to that standard before they bought it, they would have had to pay so much more for it, and finding it in that condition, and knowing that they could not use it in connection with the main line without expending this large sum of money upon it, that just shews that although it cannot be said in the proper sense to be part of the price of the line, it is certainly part of the cost of that line to be wrought along with the main line. I think that is quite sufficient to dispose of the portion of the case relating to the Sutherland and Caithness line.

But there have been some observations made upon the details of those two sums of £9119 and £1555, as brought out in the case. It is said that when you look at these details, they look many of them a good deal like maintenance of the line. Well, so it is, but then in the ordinary case it is very possible that some of these things might come under the head of mere annual maintenance of the line. But these details must not be read except in connection with what is entered in the appellants' books as the description and purpose of that expenditure, which is to renew or improve the Sutherland and Caithness line so as to bring it up to the standard of the main line. All these details are necessary and indispensable to effecting the object of improving the Sutherland and Caithness line up to the main line standard.

Then when we come to the question about the condition of the main line itself, it must be kept in view that this is not a mere relaying of line after the old fashion. It is not taking away rails that are worn out or partially worn out and renewing them in whole or in part along the whole line. That would not alter the character of the line; it would not affect the nature of the heritable property possessed by the company. But what has been done is to substitute one kind of rail for another—steel rails for iron rails. Now, that is a material alteration, and a very great improvement in the corpus of the heritable estate belonging to the company, and so stated, surely is a charge against capital. All that is done, it will be observed from the details given with reference to this matter, is to charge the price of the rails and chairs,—that is to say, the weight in addition to what was the original weight of the rails and chairs. That is the whole charge, and that is a charge made entirely for the improvement of the property—the permanent improvement of the property. Now, that that can be anything but a charge against capital, I am unable to see. Certainly, if you build a new house upon your land, that is an addition to the property and an improvement to the property, and that never becomes a charge against income; and just as little, if you build up a railway upon the line which you possess, which is to be a much more valuable railway than that which you have removed, just as little can that be a charge against income. It is a material improvement in the subject, and consequently must form a charge against capital. For these reasons, without going further into detail, I must say that I have no doubt as to the soundness of the decision of the Commissioners.

WILLIAM MUIR, of Inistrynich, died on 30th May 1880, survived by William Campbell Muir, his only child. He left a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 16th October 1877, by which he appointed his son and others to be his trustees.

1st DIVISION.
C.

The fourth purpose of the trust-deed was as follows:—"(Quarto), I direct and appoint my said trustees and their foresaids to hold and administer the whole residue and remainder of my means and estate for behoof of and equally among the children of the said William Campbell Muir, and to accumulate the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds thereof until the said children respectively attain the age of twenty-five, or, in case of daughters, until they attain that age or be married, whichever of these events shall first happen; and the shares of the accumulated principal and interest shall, in the case of sons, be paid to them on their respectively attaining to twenty-five years of age; and in the case of daughters, on their respectively attaining the said age or at marriage (if sooner), their accumulated shares shall be ascertained and set apart, and be held and applied for them respectively in liferent, for their liferent alimentary use allenary, and their respective children in fee, subject to the following conditions, viz., . . . (3) On the death of any of the said daughters of the said William Campbell Muir, and of any husband enjoying a liferent interest in the trust moneys, my trustees shall pay over to their children and the heirs of such children, in equal shares, the fee of their mother's share, held in trust as aforesaid, payable to them respectively, in the case of sons, on their attaining twenty-five years of age, and in the case of daughters, on their attaining to that age or being married, whichever of these events shall first happen, until which time the income shall be applied for behoof of the said children respectively: And it is hereby specially provided and declared, that in the event of any of the sons of the said William Campbell Muir dying before the said period of payment leaving lawful issue, such issue shall be entitled, equally among them, to the share to which their parent would have been entitled if in life, the issue of my female grandchildren being provided for under the above destination; and in the event of any of the said sons of the said William Campbell Muir or their issue dying before the respective periods of payment of their shares without leaving lawful issue, the share of such deceiver shall fall to and be divided equally among the survivors and survivor of my said grandchildren jointly with the lawful issue of any of them who may have deceased leaving children, such issue succeeding equally among them to the share to which their parent would have been entitled if in life."

William Campbell Muir was married in 1867, and six daughters and two sons were born of the marriage. All of the children, with the exception of the two youngest daughters, were born before the death of their grandfather.

The second daughter, Annie Elizabeth Muir, who was born in 1870, died on 28th November 1887, intestate and without issue.

Questions having arisen as to her share of the residue of her grandfather's estate, a special case was presented for the opinion and judgment

No. 172. of the Court. The trustees of the late Mr Muir were the first parties, William Campbell Muir was the second party, and his surviving children (to whom Mr Maconochie, advocate, was appointed curator ad litem) were the third parties thereto.

July 12, 1889.
Muir's Trustees v. Muir.

The parties of the first and third part maintained that on a sound construction of the said trust-disposition and settlement, no right to a share of the residue of the late William Muir's estate vested in the deceased Annie Elizabeth Muir, but that the share which the first parties would have been bound to set apart for her if she had attained twenty-five years of age or been married still formed part of the undivided residue of the said trust-estate to which those children only who should survive the term of payment, or in the case of daughters be married should that event first happen, should have right. The second party maintained that on a sound construction of the said trust-disposition and settlement (a), the equal share of the residue of William Muir's estate provided for the deceased Annie Elizabeth Muir along with the other children of William Campbell Muir alive at the date of the death of William Muir, became, by her death without leaving issue, intestate estate of the late William Muir, to which the second party was entitled to succeed as his father's heir in mobilibus; or (b), alternatively that William Campbell Muir was entitled to one-half of the capital of her share, to be ascertained as at the date of Miss Annie Elizabeth Muir's death, as heir of his daughter, the remaining half devolving on his surviving children as next of kin of their deceased sister.<sup>1</sup>

The following questions were submitted to the Court:—"1. Did the share of the residue of the late William Muir's estate, which under his trust-disposition and settlement would have been set apart for Miss Annie Elizabeth Muir in liferent, and for her children in fee, had she attained the age of twenty-five years or been married, become on her death without leaving issue—(a) Intestate estate of the said William Muir, to which the second party is now entitled to succeed as his heir in mobilibus; or (b) Intestate estate of the said Miss Annie Elizabeth Muir, to one half of the capital of which the second party is now entitled to succeed in terms of section 3 of the Intestate Moveable Succession Act, 1855, and the other half of which falls to be paid to her surviving brothers and sisters as her next of kin? or (2) Did no right to the fee of a share of the residue of the late William Muir's estate vest in the said Miss Annie Elizabeth Muir, and does the whole of said residue fall to be divided, in terms of the said trust-disposition and settlement, among the other children of the said William Campbell Muir or their issue, to the exclusion of the said Annie Elizabeth Muir, or anyone claiming through her?"

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The question for our decision here depends on the construction of the trust-deed of the late Mr Muir of Inistrynich, which is dated in October 1877.

The testator died possessed of considerable landed property, and to that his only child, Mr William Campbell Muir, succeeded. The settlement with which we have to deal conveys moveable property only, and the purposes of the deed are all directed to the division of that property among the children of William character, beyond which he takes no benefit by the deed. Muir's Trustees v. Muir.

At the time of the testator's death his son had six children, two sons and four daughters, but since his death two other children, both daughters, have been born of the marriage. Accordingly, in dealing with his grandchildren the testator was necessarily dealing with an unascertained class, for not only might one or more of the children have died, but others might be born, as indeed happened.

The provision of the deed which we have to construe runs thus,—“(Quarto), I direct and appoint my said trustees and their foressaids to hold and administer the whole residue and remainder of my means and estate for behoof of, and equally among, the children of the said William Campbell Muir, and to accumulate the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds thereof until the said children respectively attain the age of twenty-five, or, in case of daughters, until they attain that age or be married, whichever of these events shall first happen; and the shares of the accumulated principal and interest shall, in the case of sons, be paid to them on their respectively attaining to twenty-five years of age; and in the case of daughters, on their respectively attaining the said age or at marriage (if sooner), their accumulated shares shall be ascertained and set apart, and be held and applied for them respectively in liferent, for their liferent alimentary use alienarly, and their respective children in fee,” subject to certain conditions. It then provided,—“(3) On the death of any of the said daughters of the said William Campbell Muir, and of any husband enjoying a liferent interest in the trust moneys, my trustees shall pay over to their children and the heirs of such children, in equal shares, the fee of their mother's share, held in trust as aforesaid, payable to them respectively, in the case of sons on their attaining twenty-five years of age, and in the case of daughters on their attaining to that age or being married, whichever of these events shall first happen, until which time the income shall be applied for behoof of the said children respectively: And it is hereby specially provided and declared that, in the event of any of the sons of the said William Campbell Muir dying before the said period of payment, leaving lawful issue, such issue shall be entitled, equally among them, to the share to which their parent would have been entitled if in life, the issue of my female grandchildren being provided for under the above destination; and in the event of any of the said sons of the said William Campbell Muir or their issue dying before the respective periods of payment of their shares without leaving lawful issue, the share of such decesser shall fall to and be divided equally among the survivors and survivor of my said grandchildren jointly with the lawful issue of any of them who may have deceased leaving children, such issue succeeding equally among them to the share to which their parent would have been entitled if in life.” It is to be observed, in the first place, as regards daughters, that they can never take more than an alimentary liferent in the shares provided for them,—there is no provision for them getting a fee; but as regards sons, there is a clause of survivorship in the event of their dying without lawful issue.

Now, what happened was this: Annie Elizabeth Muir, the second daughter of Mr William Campbell Muir, died unmarried and intestate in 1887, the testator himself having died in 1880. The question therefore comes to be, what became of the share provided for her and her children, if she had any. The contention of her father is that her share is either intestate succession of William Muir or intestate succession of Miss Annie Elizabeth Muir.

The second of these contentions is clearly inadmissible, because the fee of her share did not and never could belong to her. As to the first contention, it appears to me to be equally inadmissible, in respect of the nature of the provisions in the deed. Mr Campbell Muir's counsel cited the case of Paxton's Trustees (13 R. 1191), and said that the decision there afforded authority for holding that Miss Annie's share lapsed by her death, and fell to be dealt with as intestate succession of her grandfather.

Now, the case of Paxton's Trustees established the important general rule, which is thus expressed as the result of the judgment, "that when a legacy is given to a plurality of persons, named or sufficiently described for identification, 'equally among them,' or 'in equal shares,' or 'share and share alike,' or in any other language of the same import, there is (in the absence of expressions by the testator importing a contrary intention) no room for accretion in the event of the predecease of one or more of the legatees, and this whether the gift is in liferent or in fee to the whole equally, or whether the subject of the gift be residue or a sum of fixed amount, or corporeal moveables." Now, the first condition for the application of that rule is, that the persons to whom the legacy is left must either be named or sufficiently described for identification. It cannot, therefore, apply to a class of persons of unascertained number, and therefore I think that Paxton's case has no application to the present. The principle of the rule of that case is that each share is looked upon as a separate bequest, and if a person to whom a share is bequeathed dies without issue the share falls into intestacy of the testator or into residue, if there is a residuary clause. Here, however, the class is unascertained, and some get their shares simply in liferent, while others get theirs in fee, while as regards the sons' shares, there is an express clause of survivorship, and, therefore, if a son died the result would be, not to send his share into intestacy, but that it would accrete to the other grandchildren.

That being so, the case seems to me to present no further difficulty. The fund to be divided is the residue and remainder of William Muir's estate, and when the time for division comes the question is, first, what is the amount of the estate, and, second, who are entitled to share in it. That being so, the share which would have fallen to Annie Elizabeth Muir, had she attained the age of twenty-five or been married, just forms part of the residue which is undivided. The result therefore is that the first question here must be answered in the negative, because the share which would have come to the deceased daughter is neither intestate succession of the testator nor of herself.

The second question is, "Did no right to the fee of a share of the residue of the late William Muir's estate vest in the said Miss Annie Elizabeth Muir, and does the whole of said residue fall to be divided, in terms of the said trust-disposition and settlement, among the other children of the said William Campbell Muir or their issue, to the exclusion of the said Annie Elizabeth Muir, or anyone claiming through her?" and that falls to be answered in the affirmative. The third and fourth questions are superseded by the answers given to the first and second.

LORD MURE and LORD ADAM concurred.

LORD SHAND was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that the share of the residue of the late William Muir's estate which, under his trust-disposition and settlement, would have been set apart for Miss Annie Elizabeth Muir in liferent and for her children in fee, had she attained the age of twenty-five years or been married, did not become, on her death without leaving issue, either intestate estate of the said William Muir or intestate estate of the said Miss Annie Elizabeth Muir: Find and declare that no right to the fee of a share of the residue of the late William Muir's estate vested in the said Miss Annie Elizabeth Muir, and that the whole of the said residue falls to be divided in terms of the said trust-disposition and settlement among the other children of the said William Campbell Muir or their issue, to the exclusion of the said Annie Elizabeth Muir or anyone claiming through her."

By the contract of copartnery the business of the firm in India was to be carried on by managing agents in Calcutta who were required to be partners, and they alone were entitled to use the firm's name. A firm in London were declared to be the agents of the partnership in Europe to whom the produce of the firm was to be consigned and the proceeds of the sales in India were to be remitted. The London agents were to make the advances necessary for carrying on the business, and held a mortgage over the assets, which were vested in trustees in Great Britain. A committee of the partners in England was appointed to advise with the agents both in London and Calcutta, and, subject to the approval of a general meeting of the partners, to decide on all matters affecting the partnership.

It was further provided that on the death of a partner his representatives should not "become a partner," and that his interest in the profits and losses of the partnership should cease on the 30th September next after his death, and that his share should be "ascertained and dealt with in manner following,—that is to say, if the . . . representatives of such . . . deceased partner shall desire to sell such share to any of the partners, or to any other person, such other person to be approved by the committee, the same may be sold accordingly for such price or value as may be agreed upon." v. Laidlay's
Trustees.

The executors of a deceased partner, residing in the United Kingdom, sold his shares to his three sons, also residing there. In the inventory of moveable estate belonging to the deceased in the United Kingdom, the executors did not enter the value of the deceased's shares in the partnership. In an action at the instance of the Inland Revenue against the executors concluding for additional inventory-duty in respect of the value of the shares, the Court held that whether the partnership was to be regarded as an Indian or a British partnership, the additional duty was exigible on the ground that the executors being precluded by the contract from holding shares in the partnership, the right vested in them was a right to a sum of money recoverable in this country, dis. Lord Shand, who held that the right vested in the executors at the deceased's death was a share in an Indian company, and that that share was not liable for inventory-duty in the United Kingdom.

Opinion, per Lord Fraser, that the partnership was English.

Exchequer Cause.
1st Division.
Lord Fraser.
M.

JOHN WATSON LAIDLAY of Seacliff died on 8th March 1885.

His widow Mrs Ellen Laidlay and others, his trustees and executors, gave up an inventory of his personal estate in the United Kingdom.

At the end of the inventory under the head "abroad" there was stated a sum of £25,221, 4s. 3d. said to be "the deceased's share in the real and personal estate as a partner in the firm of Robert Watson & Company, Calcutta, as valued by the agents of the company."

The deceased's share in the nett balance of the partnership assets was not included in the inventory as estate in the United Kingdom, and no inventory-duty was paid on it.

The deceased held three one-thirty-second shares in the firm, which, under an agreement taking effect as from 8th September 1885, were transferred by his trustees and executors one to each of his three sons, the price paid for each share being £9000.

On 20th February 1888, the Lord Advocate, on behalf of the Inland Revenue, raised an action against Mr Laidlay's trustees and executors for payment of £756 as additional inventory-duty in respect of the deceased's share in the business of Robert Watson & Company.

The pursuer averred;—(Cond. 4) "The firm of Robert Watson & Company was an English company, and was domiciled in England, not in India. The articles of partnership under which it was constituted were executed in London, and all the parties to it were, with the exception of two, resident in the United Kingdom. The whole partnership assets were held in the name of three trustees residing there, two of whom were partners, and these two partners, with other three partners, also resident at home, formed a committee of management, who took charge of the conduct of the business. The head office of the partnership was in London, and, as provided by the articles, there were two sets of agents. The European business was conducted through the London agents. The produce of the partnership was also consigned to them, or, if sold in India, the proceeds were remitted to them forthwith. The meetings of the partners took place in this country. Balances of the firm's affairs were struck, and profits were distributed yearly, payment being made to the partners by Matheson & Company."

He further averred;—(Cond. 5) "The deceased's interest or share in the assets of the partnership was estate situated in this country."

In answer to cond. 4 the defenders stated;—(Ans. 4) "Denied that the firm of Robert Watson & Company was an English company domiciled in England. The articles were executed where the partners respectively happened to be at the time. Two of the partners were resident in Calcutta and signed there. Of the persons who held the partnership property as trustees (subject to the mortgage to the bankers), two only were partners of Robert Watson & Company, and the other was a partner of Matheson the time resident at home, but they had not the active management of the concern. The head office of the partnership was not in London, but in Calcutta, as provided by article 14. In conformity with the said articles of partnership, the business of Robert Watson & Company was carried on by Jardine, Skinner, & Company, the 'managing agents in Calcutta,' in communication with Matheson & Company, the financial agents and bankers in London, who were creditors and mortgagees of the company. The business books of the company were kept at Jardine, Skinner, & Company's office in Calcutta, where the annual balance-sheets were prepared, and the profits appropriated to the partners by the managing agents. They annually made up and transmitted to London a report and abstracts of accounts shewing the business and profits of the year, and in the case of each partner, his share of profits and the state of his partnership account. These reports and accounts were certified by the managing agents, and upon receipt by Matheson & Company, were forwarded to each partner. The profits were passed by the managing agents to the credit of the partners in the books of the firm at Calcutta, in proportion to their shares. The profits were paid to the partners through Matheson & Company, the financial agents and bankers of the company."

July 12, 1889.
Lord Advocate
v. Laidlay's
Trustees.

In answer to cond. 5 they stated;—"Denied that the deceased's share or interest was estate in Great Britain. It was estate locally situated in India, and as such the defenders were called upon, and, under the advice of Indian counsel, paid probate-duty in India."

The pursuer pleaded;—(1) In respect that the said partnership was truly an English company, the interest or share of a deceased partner in the partnership assets is liable to inventory-duty.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) On a sound construction of the articles of association of Robert Watson & Company and the acting of parties in conformity therewith, the share of the late John Watson Laidlay in the said concern does not form a part of his personal or moveable estate or effects in the United Kingdom, within the meaning of the statutes regulating inventory-duty. (2) The business of Robert Watson & Company being chiefly carried on in India, where their principal office is, the share and interest of John Watson Laidlay therein at his death was locally situated in India within the meaning of the said statutes, and is not liable to inventory-duty.

The nature of the business of Robert Watson & Company (which was a common law partnership) was defined in article 2 of the articles of partnership of August 1877, and was as follows:—"The business shall be the carrying on and working of indigo and silk concerns and zemindaries for the production or manufacture or working of indigo and silk and other produce, and for the sale in Calcutta, or shipment for realisation in Europe of such produce."*

* The following articles of the contract of partnership were of importance in the case:—" (5) The partnership term (subject to the 32d clause) shall be for five years commencing on the 1st day of October 1877 and thenceforth for a further term of five years unless a majority of the partners shall at least six months before the expiration of the first term otherwise declare by letter delivered to the managing agents in Calcutta. . . . (8) The said style or firm of 'Robert Watson & Company' may be used by Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company or other, the managing agents for the time being appointed in their stead, and under the special or general authority in writing of such managing agents, but not otherwise by the Mofussil manager in all dealings and transactions, and in all actions and suits by and against the company, and in all other matters and proceedings which can be conducted in the name of the said firm, but the partners or any of them as such shall not be at liberty to use the said style or firm for any purpose or on any pretext whatsoever. In case of any action, suit, or other proceeding by or against the said partnership, the names of the trustees thereof for the time being may be used. (9) The following persons, viz. James Dalrymple, John Watson Laidlay, Graham Moore Robertson, Charles Binny Skinner, and John Matheson Macdonald shall constitute a committee to advise with the agents both in London and in Calcutta, and to decide, subject to the approval of a general meeting of the partners, on all matters affecting the interest of the partnership, and also to decide as to calling, when necessary, a meeting of the partners. Any three of the committee shall constitute a quorum, and in case of vacancy the majority of partners shall supply the same. (10) Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company are hereby constituted the managing agents of the partnership in India, and the entire business of the partnership there shall be carried on by them as such managing agents subject to the provisions herein contained, but only so long as the said firm of Jardine, Skinner, & Company, or some or one of the partners therein shall, in their or his own right, hold or be entitled to at least two thirty-second shares in the property of the partnership hereby constituted. . . . (11) Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company, as such managing agents, shall have all powers necessary for the efficient carrying on of the business thereof, and are hereby expressly empowered (but subject to the opinion of the committee whenever it shall have been expressed) to decide whether all the said branches of business shall be carried on, or which of them, and to what extent. . . . (14) All necessary books of account of the partnership shewing the receipts and payments and assets and liabilities of the partnership shall be kept by Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company, as the managing agents, at their usual place of business in Calcutta, and shall be at all times open for the inspection of the partners respectively. . . . (15) As soon as practicable after the 30th day of September in each year and the realisation of the produce of the season, the managing agents in Calcutta shall prepare a general account or balance-sheet shewing the result of the operations of the partnership during the year ending on that day, and the net profit or gross loss, after paying or providing for all the outlay, expenses, and engagements of the year of every kind, shall be appropriated as follows:—The profits to the extent of 8 per cent on the capital shall be carried to the account of the respective partners in the books of the partnership, in proportion to their respective shares; the excess of the profits beyond 8 per cent shall be set apart and paid to the London agents, to form and afterwards maintain a reserve fund not exceeding £50,000, and after the same shall have been formed, to keep it up to that amount. All surplus profits, when the reserve fund amounts to £50,000, shall be carried to the credit of the several partners in proportion to their respective shares. . . . (18) As a remuneration for the trouble as managing agents of the partnership business, Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company shall be entitled to receive a commission of 2½ per cent on the proceeds of sale of the indigo and silk and other produce to be produced in the concerns of the partnership in each year, whether the same shall be sold in Calcutta or shipped for realisation in Europe, they paying thereout all the Calcutta charges and expenses of managing the business of the partnership, as provided in the 13th clause. (19) The said Messrs Matheson & Company are hereby declared to be the agents of the partnership in Europe, the entire business of which therein shall be transacted through them, and all the produce of the partnership shall be consigned to them, or if sold in India, the proceeds shall forthwith be remitted to them. The said Messrs Matheson & Company shall supply the necessary funds for the current advances of each season, whether for working the estates, the production of indigo, silk, or other produce, and the same shall be on the security of the mortgages and covenants contained in the indentures of mortgage and confirmation hereinbefore referred to. . . . (21) No partner or partners shall contract any debt, or draw,

It was further admitted,—“(2) The meetings of the committee named No. 173. and appointed by No. 9 of the articles of 1877 took place in London, in the office of Matheson & Company, the London agents of the partnership, and were summoned by Matheson & Company, acting in concert with the chairman of the committee, who was resident in England. accept, or indorse any bill or note, or transact any business in the name of the partnership, nor shall any of the partners, not being a majority of the partners, in any manner interfere with the conduct of the business of the partnership by Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company, or Messrs Matheson & Company respectively, but all powers for controlling, regulating, ordering, and managing the affairs of the partnership, which, consistently with the provisions of these presents, may be exercised by all the partners for the time being, may be exercised by a majority of the partners. (25) The bankruptcy, insolvency, or death of any partner shall not cause a dissolution of the partnership as among or between the other partners, nor shall any trustee or assignee of any such bankrupt or insolvent partner, or the representatives of any deceased partner become a partner in respect of any share of such partner, but the interest of such bankrupt or insolvent partner in the profits and losses of the partnership shall cease as from the 30th day of September preceding or being the date of the order declaring his bankruptcy or insolvency, and the interest of such deceased partner or his representatives in the said profits and losses shall cease on the 30th day of September next after his decease, or if he shall die on the 30th day of September, then shall cease on such day of his decease, and the share of such bankrupt, insolvent, or deceased partner shall be ascertained and dealt with in manner following,—that is to say, if the trustees, assignees, or representatives of such bankrupt, insolvent, or deceased partner shall desire to sell such share to any of the partners, or to any other person, such other person to be approved by the committee, the same may be sold accordingly, for such price or value as may be agreed upon, but if such trustees, assignees, or representatives shall not desire to sell such share, or shall not, within six calendar months after such bankruptcy, insolvency, or death, find a purchaser whom the committee shall approve, and complete the sale to some other partner, or to such other person, then, and in such case, the fair value of the share of such bankrupt, insolvent, or deceased partner, on the 30th day of September on which his interest is to cease, as aforesaid, shall be determined by Messrs Matheson & Company, and upon such trustees, assignees, or representatives executing such transfer or assignment as hereinafter mentioned, but not otherwise, the trustees of the partnership shall pay or cause to be paid or secured, as hereinafter mentioned, the sum so determined as aforesaid, and such payment may be made either as to the whole amount in cash or (at the option of the trustees) by equal half-yearly instalments, extending over any period not exceeding three years, reckoning from the 30th day of September on which the interest of such bankrupt or insolvent or deceased partner's share is to cease, as hereinbefore provided, together with the interest thereon at the rate of £5 per cent per annum, and such instalments of unpaid purchase-money shall be secured by a mortgage of the entirety of the share so sold, and the trustees or assignees of such bankrupt or insolvent partner or the representatives of such deceased partner shall be bound, upon such valuation being made by the said Messrs Matheson & Company, and upon or before receiving such payment or security as aforesaid, to execute to the said trustees of the partnership, or to a purchaser thereof, approved by the committee, transfer or assignment of the entire share of the bankrupt, insolvent, or deceased partner in the partnership property, and in the case of a deceased partner, the trustees of the partnership or purchaser taking his share as aforesaid shall enter into a covenant with the representatives to indemnify the estate of such deceased partner from all liabilities in respect of the share so taken. The funds to be paid by the said trustees of the partnership shall be provided by the partners rateably.” By article 35 Messrs Matheson & Company were irrevocably appointed arbitrators to determine any dispute between partners or their representatives in relation to the contract of copartnership, or matters not provided for therein.

as a rule met prior to the annual meeting of the partners to consider the business to be laid before the meeting, and at other times when any business required it, of which they were informed by Matheson & Company, to whom the regular advices as to the state of the business were addressed by the managing agents in India. A minute-book of meetings and correspondence was kept for the committee, of which Matheson & Company were the custodiers. The minute-book in use from and after 1st October 1877 is produced and admitted as correct (No. 18 of process).* The committee discharged the duties devolving upon them under the said articles, and were in correspondence with the managing agents in India, as shewn by the said minute-book. The committee was composed of men who were conversant with Indian affairs; and in addition to arranging the business to be laid before the general meetings of the partners, they advised upon the desirability of any transaction referred to them for consideration and report by the partners or by the managing agents in India.

(3) The financial year of the partnership closed, in terms of article 15, on 30th September in each year; and as soon as possible thereafter, Jardine, Skinner, & Company, on the footing that there was sufficient profit, passed a dividend at the rate of 8 per cent to the credit of each partner's account in the books of the partnership. Messrs Matheson & Company were advised thereof, and requested to make, and did make, payment of the dividend to the partners respectively. This payment was generally made in or about the month of December. As soon as the result of the year's operations was ascertained, and after receiving the particulars of the London account from Matheson & Company, Jardine, Skinner, & Company made up detailed accounts of such operations, and if there was any profit above the 8 per cent and the contribution to the reserve fund provided for under the articles of copartnery, they passed the same to the partners' accounts, in proportion to their respective interests in the concern. Those accounts, along with a statement of each partner's own private account, including his share of profits, were sent to Matheson & Company, who transmitted abstracts of the accounts and printed statements and reports relative thereto to the partners, along with the statement of their private account. These accounts were generally circulated by Messrs Matheson & Company about June or July in each year; and within a few days after they remitted to each partner his share of the final dividend, or passed same to the credit of his private account with them, if he had such. The partners resident in Great Britain were generally in the habit of holding an annual meeting in the course of each summer, when convenient to the general body of the partners, and irrespective of the distribution of the accounts and dividend. These and other meetings were held at Messrs Matheson & Company's office, and the notices summoning the same were issued sometimes in name of the committee, but more generally by Matheson & Company themselves. At these annual meetings the partners discussed the accounts and the general prospects of the company. Decisions were given by the general body of the partners, at their annual meeting, upon points connected with the business submitted to them for that purpose by the managing agents in India through the committee. Where the assent of a majority of partners was required, it was provided by article 27 that such might be given by letter in writing. This assent was usually obtained at the annual meeting of the partners in London, and communicated by the committee to the managing agents in India, but in one or two cases the assent was given by letter addressed to the chairman of the committee and communicated in the same way. . . . (5) The firm of Jardine, Skinner, & Company, of Calcutta, No. 173. or some or one of the partners therein, in their or his own right, held two shares in the property of the partnership, as required by article 10. Matheson & Company were not required to hold, and did not hold, any shares, but a partner of Matheson & Company was one of the three trustees resident in this country in whom the property of the partnership of Robert Watson & Company was vested, in terms of the articles of partnership. (6) Jardine, Skinner, & Company, as managing agents in India, conducted the practical working of the indigo and silk concerns and zemindaries for the production and manufacture of indigo, silk, and other produce. In terms of article 11, they appointed and discharged the whole staff of servants in the employment of the company in India, and exercised the powers therein conferred in reference to actions and other proceedings, and they also, under the general powers of the said 11th article, took on lease land and other heritable subjects for the purposes of the business, and granted leases of heritable property belonging to the company. They also contracted loans, and bought and sold land and other property for the purposes of the business. Reference is made to the minute-book from and after 1st October 1877 (No. 18 of process) as shewing the relations of the committee and partners to these actings of the managing agents in India. . . . (8) In virtue of article 14, all necessary books of account of the partnership, shewing the receipts and payments and assets and liabilities, were kept by Jardine, Skinner, & Company as the managing agents in India, at their usual place of business in Calcutta, and these were open to the inspection of the partners respectively, or any person or persons specially appointed for that purpose by any of the said partners respectively, as provided for in the article. These business books were separate from the ordinary business books of Jardine, Skinner, & Company. . . . (10) The produce of the partnership estates was either realised by Jardine, Skinner, & Company, and the proceeds remitted to the London agents, or it was consigned to the London agents for realisation in Europe, all in terms of article 19. In the latter case, Matheson & Company transmitted to Jardine, Skinner, & Company statements shewing the realisation for entry in the business books of the partnership in India, which statements were entered accordingly. In carrying out the said article 19, Matheson & Company were, during the whole period of the partnership under advance to Robert Watson & Company, as the outlay was chiefly at the beginning of each season, and from the nature of the business no season's accounts could be closed until from six to nine months after the next season had begun. (11) The reserve fund mentioned in article 15 was uninvested, and existed merely as a floating balance in favour of the firm in the hands of Matheson & Company."

On 15th March 1889 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) pronounced this interlocutor:—"Decerns and ordains the defenders to exhibit upon oath or affirmation, and to record in the proper Sheriff Court in Scotland a full and true inventory, or additional inventory, of all the personal or moveable estate and effects of the deceased John Watson Laidlay not contained in any inventory hitherto exhibited, and that within fourteen days from this date, and continues the cause, reserving the question of expenses."*

* "OPINION.—The claim is for inventory or probate-duty, and the answer to that question depends upon whether or not the property of the deceased is held to be situated in India or in the United Kingdom. This property consisted of a share in the real and personal estate as a partner in the firm of Robert Watson & Company of Calcutta, which was sold after the death of Mr Laidlay to his sons at the price of £27,000.

"The firm of Robert Watson & Company consisted at the time of the death

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—The partnership was an Indian partnership. All the books were kept there, and the balance-sheets were of Mr Laidlay of sixteen partners, and its business was 'the carrying on and working of indigo and silk concerns and zemindaries for the production or manufacture or working of indigo and silk and other produce, and for the sale in Calcutta or shipment for realisation in Europe of such produce.' The whole work done under the partnership in the production of the articles dealt in was done in India. Managing agents, in the persons of Jardine, Skinner, & Company, were appointed to superintend the works in India with very extensive powers, and it was declared that all the produce of the concerns of the partnership should be received and disposed of by them. All the necessary books of account of the partnership were to be kept by them, but they were subject to the control of a committee of five members, who had also very extensive powers. They were to advise with the agents both in London and in Calcutta, and to decide, subject to the approval of a general meeting of the partners, on all matters affecting the interest of the partnership. The minute-book, which has been produced, indicates how close was the supervision which they exercised. Besides the agents in Calcutta, the partnership had also London agents, viz., Matheson & Company, to whom all the produce of the partnership sent to Europe for sale was to be consigned, and if such produce were sold in India, the proceeds were to be forthwith remitted to Matheson & Company by Jardine, Skinner, & Company.

"Now, the deceased Mr Laidlay had three shares in this partnership, and the question comes to be whether these shares shall be held as an asset in his possession in Scotland, where he was domiciled and where he died, or whether they shall be held as an asset situated in India, in which latter case no inventory-duty as under the statutes mentioned on record could be claimed. The contract of copartnery provides for the case of the death of a partner. In such a case it is declared that his interest in the partnership shall cease as at the 30th day of September after his decease,—that is, his representatives shall be entitled to claim profits made between the date of the death and the 30th of September, but not after the latter date, though they are entitled to the value of the deceased's interest in the partnership. Such value may be realised in various ways, as provided by the 25th article of the contract of copartnery. If the representatives of the deceased shall desire to sell the share to any of the partners or to any other person, such other person to be approved by the committee, the same may be sold for such price as may be agreed upon. But if they do not desire to sell, or cannot find a purchaser approved by the committee, then the fair value of the share is to be paid to them by the trustees for the partnership.

"The first of these modes of dealing with Mr Laidlay's shares was adopted. By an agreement between Mr Laidlay's executors and three of his sons, executed partly in England and partly in Scotland, the executors agreed to sell to these sons Mr Laidlay's three shares at the price of £9000 for each share, and the purchasers being approved of by the shareholders, they became partners in room of their deceased father.

"Now, the Lord Ordinary is of opinion that the executors were not entitled to deal with Mr Laidlay's shares in the partnership without giving up an inventory and obtaining confirmation thereto. If the shares had not been sold to the sons, and if the mode of realisation was payment by the trustees to Mr Laidlay's representatives, this would simply be payment by a debtor to his creditor of a simple contract debt, and the mode in which such a debt is regarded is illustrated by the case of Fernandes' Executors (8th February 1870, L. R. 5 Chan. Appeals, 314), the rubric of which is as follows :—'A chartered bank whose head office was in England, but whose business was chiefly carried on in India, was ordered to be wound up, and the Indian assets were remitted to this country. A creditor domiciled in India proved his debt, received a dividend, and died, leaving a will, which was proved in India. After his death a final dividend became payable. Held (reversing the decision of the Master of the Rolls) that the dividend ought not to be at once remitted to the executors in made up there. The committee which met in London was one for advice No. 173. merely, and their functions were limited to subjects on which their advice was asked by the Indian committee. The centre of the business, July 12, 1889. and the place where the firm carried on its business, was India, and a Lord Advocate v. Laidlay's share of a deceased partner in a concern was an asset in the country to Trustees. which the company really belonged.<sup>1</sup> The assets of the company were almost entirely in India,—indeed, during a large part of the year there was a large debit balance in this country owing to the way in which the trade was carried on. The claim of Mr Laidlay's representatives was one to a share of the assets of an Indian company, and therefore need not be given up in an inventory in the United Kingdom.

Argued for the pursuer;—The company was an English company. The great majority of the partners were resident in the United Kingdom, and thirty out of thirty-two shares were held by partners resident here. The whole capital of the company was vested in trustees, all of whom

India, but could only be paid to them on their producing a properly stamped English probate.' Lord Gifford in delivering judgment said,—'Probate-duty, as we all know, attaches on bona notabilia in the place where the goods happen to be situate, wholly irrespective of the question of the domicile of the testator. The moneys now in question are bona notabilia in London, and I have no hesitation in saying that this Court cannot authorise the payment of them to a person who, if he were to receive them and administer them, would be going directly in the teeth of the Act of Parliament, and doing a thing for which, if the Crown chose to proceed against him, he would be liable to a penalty. Upon these grounds I am obliged to say that there can be payment only upon production of an English probate.' And Mr Hanson, in his Treatise on the Probate, Legacy, and Succession Duties Acts (p. 161), further expresses himself as follows:—'The duty is payable in respect of the whole amount which the representatives of a deceased partner in an English firm are entitled to recover and receive from the surviving partner in this country, on account of the share of the deceased, notwithstanding that the partnership assets, or any part of them, are situate abroad; for the legal interest in the partnership property vests in the surviving partner, who is liable to account for and pay to the representatives of the deceased partner the amount which may ultimately appear due to him after the assets have been realised and the partnership debts discharged, and this liability is in the nature of a personal debt, and situate therefore, like other debts, within the jurisdiction of that country where the debtor resides.' No doubt, in the present case, the profits were earned with the manufacture in India of the articles dealt in, but these profits were obtained not entirely by the exertions and the skill of the Indian managers. They were the servants and bound to obey the instructions of the London committee. Then, further, these profits were all remitted to London, and they were distributed there. Sir James Hannen, in the case of Ewing (25th January 1881, 6 Prob. Div. 19), says,—'The share of a deceased partner in a partnership asset is situate where the business is carried on, and shares in a company are locally situate where the head office is.' But the question is more complex when the business is carried on at two places—one at the place of manufacture of the article dealt in, and the other the place of the governing and directing body. One does not get much aid from the latter part of this opinion, for the question always returns, which is the head office, and as regards the present case the Lord Ordinary must hold it to be London."

resided in the United Kingdom, and the whole management of the trade of the firm was subject to the supreme control of the committee in London. The claim which Mr Laidlay's representatives had against the company was under sec. 25 of the articles merely a claim for a sum of money, and not a claim for a proportional part of the assets of the company. That claim was one which there could be no doubt could be recovered in this country, and in this view it was immaterial whether the company was an Indian or an English partnership.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The late John Watson Laidlay of Seacliff, in the county of Haddington, died on the 8th of March 1885. The defenders are his trustees and executors, and they gave up an inventory of his personal estate, upon which they obtained confirmation in April 1885. That inventory shewed a nett personal estate in the United Kingdom amounting to £294,345, and upon that amount stamp-duty was paid. But at the end of the inventory, under the head “abroad,” there was a sum stated of £25,221 which is said to be “the deceased's share in the real and personal estate as a partner in the firm of Robert Watson & Company, Calcutta, as valued by the agents of the company,” and it is alleged and admitted that “the value of the deceased's share or interest in the nett balance of the partnership assets was not included in the inventory as estate in the United Kingdom for payment of inventory-duty, and inventory-duty has not been paid upon it.”

This company of Robert Watson & Company was a common law partnership. It was not in any respect a statutory or corporate body, and therefore the rights and interests of the partners depend of course entirely upon the provisions of the contract. The contract was executed in August 1877, and the nature of the business is determined by the second article. “The business shall be the carrying on and working of indigo and silk concerns, and zemindaries for the production or manufacture or working of indigo and silk, and other produce, and for the sale in Calcutta, or shipment for realisation in Europe, of such produce.” There were sixteen partners in the concern. Fourteen of these were resident in the United Kingdom, and held thirty shares in the concern, and two were resident in Calcutta, and held one share each, the shares amounting in all to thirty-two. The shares were declared by the contract to be personal estate.

For carrying on the business there were several provisions made. In the first place, there were three trustees in whom the property of the concern was vested, and these were all resident in the United Kingdom. There was also a committee of five, all resident in the United Kingdom, and their duties are specified in the 9th head of the contract. They “shall constitute a committee to advise with the agents both in London and in Calcutta, and to decide, subject to the approval of a general meeting of the partners, on all matters affecting the interest of the partnership, and also to decide as to calling when necessary a meeting of the partners.”

The financial agents were Messrs Matheson & Company of London, and their duties are described in the 19th head of the contract, “Messrs Matheson & Company are hereby declared to be the agents of the partnership in Europe, the entire business of which therein shall be transacted through them, and all the produce of the partnership shall be consigned to them, or if sold in India, the proceeds shall forthwith be remitted to them. The said Messrs Matheson & Company shall supply the necessary funds for the current advances of each season, whether for working the estates, the production of indigo, silk, or other produce, and the same shall be on the security of the mortgages and covenants contained in the indentures of mortgage and confirmation hereinbefore referred to. Any further expenditure of moneys, whether for the purchase of new concerns or for land tenures, or for advances made to secure leases of property, or for any extraordinary expenditure under the heads of law proceedings, land surveying, machinery, or otherwise, shall be provided in such manner as the managing agents shall from time to time determine, either by a rateable contribution from the partners, which they hereby agree to make, or by charge on the profits, or by advances from the said Messrs Matheson & Company."

The managing agents were of course resident in Calcutta, because there the business of the company was to be carried on, in so far as concerned the production of the produce, which was to be either disposed of in India or sent home, and these gentlemen were to have a commission of  $2\frac{1}{2}$  per cent upon the sales. Their powers and duties of course in carrying on the business as managing agents were very large, and just such as we might expect from the nature of the business which I have already stated as appearing from the second head of the contract.

The business was carried on very much in the way that might be expected, and quite in conformity, I think, with the provisions of the contract. There is a minute of admissions regarding this matter, some parts of which it may be necessary to read. The meetings of the committee named and appointed took place in London "in the office of Matheson & Company, the London agents of the partnership, and were summoned by Matheson & Company, acting in concert with the chairman of the committee, who was resident in England. The committee as a rule, met prior to the annual meeting of the partners to consider the business to be laid before the meeting, and at other times when any business required it, of which they were informed by Matheson & Company, to whom the regular advices as to the state of the business were addressed by the managing agents in India. A minute-book of meetings and correspondence was kept for the committee, of which Matheson & Company were the custodiers. The minute-book in use from and after 1st October 1877 is produced and admitted as correct. The committee discharged the duties devolving upon them under the said articles, and were in correspondence with the managing agents in India, as shewn by the minute-book." The financial year ended on the 30th September, and as soon as possible after that the managing agents at Calcutta "on the footing that there was sufficient profit, passed a dividend at the rate of 8 per cent to the credit of each partner's account in the books of the partnership. Messrs Matheson & Company were advised thereof, and requested to make, and did make payment of the dividend to the partners respectively,"—that is, in this country,—“as soon as the result of the year's operations was ascertained, and after receiving the particulars of the London account from Matheson & Company, Jardine, Skinner, & Company” (that is, the managing agents) “made up detailed accounts of such operations, and if there was any profit above the 8 per cent and the contribution to the reserve fund provided for under the articles of copartnership, they passed the same to the partners' accounts.” Then with reference to the annual meeting of the partners, these meetings “discussed the accounts, and the general prospects of the company. Decisions were given by the general body of partners, at their annual meeting, upon points connected with the business submitted to them for that purpose by the managing agents in India through the committee." The produce of the partnership estates was either realised by Jardine, Skinner, & Company at Calcutta, and the produce remitted to the London agents, or it was consigned—that is, the produce was consigned—to the London agents for realisation in Europe. "In the latter case, Matheson & Company transmitted to Jardine, Skinner, & Company statements shewing the realisation for entry in the business books of the partnership in India, which statements were entered accordingly. In carrying out the said article 19, Matheson & Company were during the whole period of the partnership under advance to Robert Watson & Company, as the outlay was chiefly at the beginning of each season, and from the nature of the business no season's accounts could be closed until from six to nine months after the next season had begun."

Now, I shall reserve what I have to say in the meantime as to what the nature of this company is,—whether it was a company in the United Kingdom, or a company in India,—but it appears to me that the decision of this case depends not so much upon that consideration as upon the provisions made for the way in which the representatives of a deceased partner are to be dealt with, which is fixed by the 25th article of the contract. That article provides not only for the mode of dealing with a deceased partner's interest, but also with the interest of a bankrupt or insolvent partner; and in the expression of that article these things are so mixed up throughout that the reading of it leads to a little confusion, but I shall take the liberty of stating what I conceive to be the import of this clause as applicable to the case of a deceased partner only, omitting all reference to the case of a bankrupt or insolvent partner.

Now, with reference to the death of a partner it is provided, in the first place, that the death of a partner shall not cause a dissolution of the company; in the second place, the representatives of a deceased partner are not to become partners of the company; in the third place, the interest of a deceased partner ceases at the termination of the current financial year—that is to say, on the 30th September after his death; in the fourth place, the value of the deceased partner's share at 30th September is to be determined by Matheson & Company. and on the executors executing a transfer to the trustees of the deceased's share and interest in the concern, the trustees shall pay the ascertained value to the executors in cash, either in whole or by half-yearly instalments, in the option of the trustees, extending over a period of not more than three years, interest running at the rate of five per cent on the unpaid instalments. The trustees undertake also to indemnify the executors and the executry estate of liabilities incurred by the deceased as a partner; in the fifth place, the executors may, if they prefer it, within six months after the 30th of September, sell the shares of the deceased to any of the partners, or to any other person to be approved by the committee, at such prices as they can obtain therefor.

Now, this last is the course which was adopted in the present case. The three shares held by the deceased in the firm under an agreement taking effect on the 8th of September 1885 were transferred by the executors, one to each of his sons, Andrew Laidlay, Robert Watson Laidlay, and Alfred Hope Laidlay, the agreed-on price paid for each share being £9000. Now, though the executors did not become partners, and were not entitled to become partners, it will be observed that they have a right to transfer the shares to the other partners,—to the company in short, or if they prefer it, to sell them at such a price as they can obtain. Now, this right of transferring the deceased's shares, or selling and transferring them, does not in the slightest degree imply that the executors were vested with the property of these shares. It is expressly provided that the executors are not to become partners, and therefore they could not sell the shares in their character of partners. It is a power of sale, and nothing else, just analogous to those powers of appointment with which we are quite familiar in many trust-deeds; and it is perhaps still more clearly analogous to a power which is given in the Companies Act of 1862 to executors without becoming partners of the company to sell the shares of the deceased, as provided for by the 24th section of the Act of 1862, and the 14th head of the Table A. What the executors have a right to do under this 25th head of the contract is to sell that which originally belonged to the deceased, but which upon his death no longer belonged either to him or his representatives. In short, the right of the deceased partner came to an end at his death, saving, of course, his right to the balance upon the current financial year; but from his death the share in the partnership concern was no longer in bonis defuncti, and formed no part of the executry estate. Now, it seems to me to follow from this that that which the executry estate possessed under the operation of this clause was a right of claim against the trustees of the company for a sum of money; in short, the trustees became indebted to the executors in a sum of money, or the executors by means of a sale realised a sum of money; and in either case that sum of money was a debt due to the executors by their debtors in this country. It seems to me, therefore, as the result of the whole examination of this contract, the manner in which the business was carried on, and the nature of the business itself, that even if it cannot be pronounced with certainty that this is an English or a British company, or a company belonging to the United Kingdom, and carrying on business in the United Kingdom, it still is perfectly clear that the £25,221, the sum which the Crown demands shall enter the inventory of the deceased's estate, is a sum of money recoverable and recovered in this country by persons resident and domiciled here—I mean that both the creditor and the debtor in that money are resident in this country. That, I think, brings the money within the operation of the statutes regarding inventory-duty as being executry estate in the United Kingdom; and therefore I am for adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor.

LORD MURE.—I have nothing to add to the exposition which your Lordship has given of the position of this case as shewn mainly in the articles of partnership and the minutes of admission of the parties in regard to the question raised. I therefore simply state that I concur with your Lordship in thinking that the question here raised depends entirely, or at all events mainly, upon the true construction of the 25th section of the articles of copartnership, and that reading that carefully I can come to no other conclusion than that the claim which was made by the executors of the deceased partner was a claim for payment of a sum of money in England to be paid by the trustees for the company in this country. And upon that ground the sum so due to the estate of the late Mr Laidlay must enter the inventory as the Lord Ordinary has found.

LORD SHAND.—I think the question raised in this case is very well stated in two passages of the Lord Ordinary's opinion. "The claim is for inventory or probate-duty, and the answer to that question depends upon whether or not the property of the deceased is held to be situated in India, or in the United Kingdom. This property consisted of a share in the real and personal estate as a partner in the firm of Robert Watson & Company of Calcutta, which was sold after the death of Mr Laidlay to his sons at the price of £27,000." And in a subsequent part of his opinion his Lordship says,—“The deceased Mr Laidlay had three shares in this partnership, and the question comes to be whether these shares shall be held as an asset in his possession in Scotland, where he was domiciled, and where he died, or whether they shall be held as an asset situated in India, in which latter case no inventory-duty as under the statutes mentioned on record could be claimed.” I am of opinion, differing from the Lord Ordinary, and I understand from all of your Lordships, that the property was an asset of the deceased's estate situated in India, and which is therefore not liable for probate-duty in this country.

The deceased, as explained in article 1 of the condescendence, seems to have been possessed of very considerable wealth. The inventory of his personal estate in the United Kingdom is given up as £294,345, 6s. 8d., and has borne already a stamp-duty of £8832. At the end of the inventory, under the head “abroad,” there is stated a sum of £25,221, 4s. 3d., said to be “the deceased's share in the real and personal estate as a partner in the firm of Robert Watson & Company, Calcutta, as valued by the agents of the company.” That sum was not given up for inventory-duty, but I rather suppose that this note appended as to estate abroad is given in terms of some enactment in the statutes which requires a full disclosure of the personal estate to be made, in order that the Crown may consider whether they have or have not a claim for duty upon it.

Having regard to the terms of the contract of copartnery of this company, and the minute of admissions in regard to the actings under it, and to the statements and admissions generally on record, I have come to the conclusion without difficulty that the company was an Indian company, and not an English company in any proper or reasonable sense, that it was an Indian company having its capital, its property, and its whole assets in India, and carrying on its business in India, and from Calcutta as its centre, where alone it had its head office. The Lord Ordinary seems to have taken the view, although his note is not so distinct on the subject as might be desired, that the head office of the company was in London, and that London was the centre of its business. The earlier part of his opinion leaves it doubtful whether he did not regard the company as having its business centre in Calcutta, but in the concluding sentence, after referring to a passage in the opinion of Sir James Hannen in the case of Ewing, his Lordship says,—“One does not get much aid from the latter part of this opinion, for the question always returns, which is the head office, and as regards the present case the Lord Ordinary must hold it to be London.” If I had concurred with the Lord Ordinary in so thinking, I should have been for affirming his Lordship's judgment. I do not understand that your Lordships agree with the Lord Ordinary in that view. The judgment which is to be pronounced proceeds, I think, not on the view, so far as I understand your Lordships' opinions, that this was an English company. If, however, it is an Indian, and not an English company, then I think it follows that the funds in question are Indian assets, and as such are not subject to probate in this country.

Now, as I regard this question of fact, whether these are Indian assets, as being really at the root of the proper decision of the case, I must, with your Lordship's leave, notice—perhaps with some degree of detail—the provisions of the contract of copartnery of the company which affect that question, and which I think bear out the opinion I have expressed. In the first place, I find that in the narrative of the contract which was entered into in 1877 as a renewal of an older contract about to expire in that year, or rather as a new contract framed upon the basis of the former contract, this is directly set forth in the preamble, "that whereas the capital of the said partnership consists of real and personal estate in India, which by virtue of an indenture," &c., had been held by other parties named, it was thereby declared that this property should be vested in three persons thereby named and appointed as trustees for the said partnership. On the face of the deed it is thus clearly expressed, and the whole of the deed otherwise shews that the capital of the company consisted of real and personal estate locally situated in India, and nothing else. Article 2 of the contract provides that the business is to be the "manufacture or working of indigo and silk, and other produce," and the sale in Calcutta, or shipment for realisation in Europe, of indigo, silk, and other produce. That describes the business which the company were carrying on, and carrying on clearly as I think from its head office in Calcutta, for any sales which were made of produce from India sent home to Europe for the purpose of realisation were sales made by the Indian house through the London agency, the accounts for which had at once to be sent back to Calcutta, to enter the books there, and to form part of the general balance of the company. So much for the capital and business of the company.

Then as regards the management of the company, nothing is more clear than that this was a company that was being carried on and managed entirely at Calcutta as its centre. There is one peculiarity in the deed that I do not remember to have seen in the case of any common law copartnership before, though I daresay it may be common enough in these Indian companies—I mean the provision that none of the partners individually are entitled to interfere in the business. There is an express provision to that effect in section 21,—“No partner or partners shall contract any debt, or draw, accept, or indorse, any bill or note, or transact any business in the name of the partnership, nor shall any of the partners, not being a majority of the partners, in any manner interfere with the conduct of the business of the partnership by Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company, or Messrs Matheson & Company respectively.” As the partners have no right to interfere in the business, it is provided that there shall be certain managing agents, or I should rather say, managing partners of the company. They are appointed by this deed, viz., Jardine, Skinner, & Company of Calcutta, one of the provisions of the deed being that this firm or its partners must hold two shares of the company. Therefore, the company at Calcutta has its managing partners there. It further appears that all the powers which partners usually have in managing their own business are conferred upon Jardine, Skinner, & Company. They are acting in Calcutta in the management of the business, just as partners would do if they were themselves conducting the business, with one exception, and that is, that from time to time they may consult, if they desire it, a committee of three or four of the partners who are in London, but who appear to me to exercise no function except that of a consulting committee. The views I have now stated of the contract are, I think, borne out by the sections from 8 to 15 of the contract. Section 7 provides that “the style or firm of the partnership shall be Robert Watson & Company”; section 8 that “the said style or firm of Robert Watson & Company may be used by Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company or others, the managing agents for the time being appointed in their stead,” and they alone are entitled to use the said style or firm, or to authorise its use for

No. 173. any company purpose, and for instituting or carrying on any suits on behalf of the company. Article 10 provides that "Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company are hereby constituted the managing agents of the partnership in India, and the entire business of the partnership there shall be carried on by them as such managing agents, subject to the provisions herein contained." Section 11 is perhaps the most important on this subject, and it provides that "Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company, as such managing agents, shall have all powers necessary for the efficient carrying on of the business thereof, and are hereby expressly empowered (but subject to the opinion of the committee whenever it shall have been expressed) to decide whether all the said branches of business shall be carried on, or which of them, and to what extent. The said managing agents shall also determine the amount of the outlay to be expended in the business and concerns of the partnership in each year, and the mode and terms of disposal of the produce thereof, and have power to appoint and remove all persons in the employment of the partnership in India, and to give to such persons all such powers, including a power of substitution, as the said Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company may from time to time think proper. And further, the said Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company are hereby authorised to enter into all contracts necessary for the carrying on of the business of the company, to institute and defend all suits in which the partnership may be concerned, and also to compromise any such actions or suits, and to compound any debts due to the partnership or other claims and demands, and to refer any claim or demand of or against the partnership to arbitration, and generally to manage the said estate, and conduct all the affairs in India of the said partnership, and to do and execute all such acts, matters, and things as they shall deem necessary for the aforesaid purposes." It is further provided that moneys which have been borrowed from Matheson & Company, as to whose position I shall say a few words immediately, "for the purpose of the partnership and for carrying on the said concerns, shall be drawn for by Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company only," "and all the money which shall be required to be remitted to the various concerns of the partnership shall be supplied by Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company, and all the produce of the concerns of the partnership shall be received and disposed of by them." Then there is a provision that in regard to Jardine, Skinner, & Company's counting-house premises, they are to bear the expense of that themselves. Then comes this important provision in regard to the books of the company—and in passing I may say it has always been regarded in these cases as the determining or leading element in the question where the head office is to be found, that you shall ascertain where the books of the company are kept, and where the balance-sheets are struck,—(section 14) "All necessary books of account of the partnership, shewing the receipts and payments and assets and liabilities of the partnership, shall be kept by Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company as the managing agents at their usual place of business in Calcutta, and shall be at all times open for the inspection of the partners." Then follows a provision with reference to the balance-sheet, and even in the striking of the balance-sheet the partners do not interfere, nor have Matheson & Company in London anything whatever to do with that. The provision as to the balance-sheet is (section 15)—"As soon as practicable after the 30th day of September in each year, and the realisation of the produce of the season, the managing agents in Calcutta shall prepare a general account or balance-sheet, shewing the result of the operations of the partnership during the year ending on that day, and the nett profit or gross loss, after paying or providing for all the outlay, expenses, and engagements of the year of every kind, shall be appropriated as follows,—the profits to the extent of 8 per cent on the capital shall be carried to the account of the respective partners in the books of the partnership, in proportion to their respective shares ; the excess of the profits beyond 8 per cent shall be set apart and paid to the London agents to form and afterwards maintain a reserve fund.” Then article 18 provides,—“As a remuneration for the trouble as managing agents of the partnership business, Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company shall be entitled to receive a commission of 2½ per cent on the proceeds of sale of the indigo and silk and other produce to be produced in the concerns of the partnership in each year, whether the same shall be sold in Calcutta or shipped for realisation in Europe, they paying thereout all the Calcutta charges and expenses of managing the business of the partnership.” Now, that settles, I think, the position of Jardine, Skinner, & Company. They are, no doubt, to act subject to the opinion of a certain committee that meets in London, but, I think, it appears that it was only to a very limited extent that there was any opinion or advice ever given to them by this committee. We have had before us the minute-book for a number of years, and it seems to me that they have scarcely interfered in the business at all, and if they did interfere it was only when their advice was asked. They were gentlemen of experience in Indian matters, and could give the managers of the company—the partners who were carrying it on—the benefit of this experience by their advice. Such matters as the settlement of very important litigations that had arisen in regard to heritable property belonging to the company, or the like, are brought before them, and little if anything else, as appears from the minute-book which has been printed, and so very unimportant does the business appear to have been that from 1881 to the present day there is not a minute of any business done recorded in the book.

Then, what is the position of Matheson & Company, and the office they have in London? I describe them I think properly when I say that they are financial and commercial agents for the company in London. The company in its operations requires in the early part of each season a large advance of money, and Matheson & Company agree to make that advance, and as moneys come in in the course of the sales of produce, the managers of the company carrying on its business in India remit from time to time the sums which they are able to give towards the reduction of the balance in Matheson & Company's books against the company, towards which of course also is placed the proceeds of sales made in Europe. So far as I can see, Matheson & Company had practically nothing else to do, at least nothing else of importance, with this company, except that when the committee or the partners were at any time called together to talk over the business that was going on, they found a room for the purpose in Matheson & Company's premises. I think that this was the position which Matheson & Company held is quite clear from sections 19 and 20 of the contract. The 19th section provides that “the said Messrs Matheson & Company are hereby declared to be the agents of the partnership in Europe, the entire business of which therein shall be transacted through them, and all the produce of the partnership shall be consigned to them, or if sold in India, the proceeds shall forthwith be remitted to them. The said Messrs Matheson & Company shall supply the necessary funds for the current advances of each season, whether for working the estates, the production of indigo, silk, or other produce, and the

Any further expenditure of moneys, whether for the purchase of new concerns, or for land tenures, or for advances made to secure leases of property, or for any extraordinary expenditure under the heads of law proceedings, land surveying, machinery, or otherwise, shall be provided in such manner as the managing agents shall from time to time determine." And in article 20 Matheson & Company are to be "entitled to interest on the general cash balance which may be due to them at the rate of £5 per cent per annum, so long as such balance shall not exceed £150,000, and at the minimum rate charged by the Bank of England for the time being for discounts (when above 5 per cent), on any sum which may exceed that amount; they shall also be entitled to a commission of 2½ per cent on the sales of the produce of the season, whether such sales are made in India or in Europe."

v. Laidlay's

Matheson & Company, as agents of the company in this country, are thus paid a sum of 2½ per cent, mainly because they are advancing in a great measure the funds which from time to time are required for carrying on the company. They are the agents in London merely of a company which is carrying on its business in Calcutta. They have no right or power to use or sign the company name or firm—a circumstance of itself I think sufficient to shew that their office is not the head office of the company, but the office of agents only. On the other hand, Messrs Jardine, Skinner, & Company are the managing partners at the head office of the business.

It is only necessary that I should notice farther that in addition to these officials there are several trustees named, being the persons to whom I have already alluded in referring to the preamble of the contract, but these trustees have no functions other than to hold the property. They hold the property in trust. It was necessary to give some persons a title to hold the property, just as is done in the case of the large insurance companies we have in this city. Certain trustees are named, in whom the property is vested in trust. Beyond the holding of that property, I do not see that these trustees had any functions or duties whatever. They are not persons who intromit with the money in any way whatever in the conduct of the business.

Now, such being the terms of the contract, and the way in which the contract was worked, there appears to me to be no doubt that the company is not an English company, but that it is an Indian company, carrying on its business in India, and which has its head office in Calcutta. The assets of the company are Indian assets, and the share which any person has in the copartnery is a share of an Indian business. Mr Laidlay when he died was a partner in this Indian business. Part of his personal estate, therefore, was locally situated in India, that estate being his share in this business. Whether his right is to be regarded as being a certain proportion or share of the company's capital and assets, or whether we regard the company (as it is in Scotland) as a separate persona, which it is not in India, and his right is to claim a share in the business, the assets of which belong to the company, the result is the same. The asset or right has as its subject property in India. It is a share in a business carried on in India. That being so, I confess myself unable to see that by his death all this was changed, and that what was an Indian asset immediately before his death instantly became an asset of his estate locally situated in Scotland in consequence of his death. I think it quite proper to put the test proposed in the argument—I think the proper test in a question of this kind—viz., was confirmation necessary to enable the executors to deal with that part of the testator's estate? and I answer that question in the negative. The estate or (as I see in the English cases estate of this kind is called) the bona notabilia being situated in India, probate there would necessarily be required in order to authorise realisation, and we see from the defenders' statement on record that probate in India was taken out accordingly. What has happened is this, that Indian estate and no other has been realised. Now, I cannot see that the mode in which the property or right vested in Mr Laidlay was realised could convert it in the persons of the executors realising it from Indian estate into Scotch estate. What in point of fact occurred was this, that under section 25 of the contract of copartnership, which empowers the executors of partners who die to dispose of their shares in the company, the shares of Mr Laidlay were sold and disposed of by the executors to persons who assumed precisely the rights in the partnership assets or business which Mr Laidlay had. There were sons of Mr Laidlay who were anxious to get his share of the business apparently, and they agreed to take it and to pay for it, and accordingly the share or interest which Mr Laidlay had in this business was bought by these sons and transferred to them. The subject of that sale, however, surely was Indian estate, or Mr Laidlay's right to shares of an Indian business which was Indian estate—bona notabilia situated in India. It was a sale. It has been suggested that there was no right in the assets of this company at the time of sale. It is true the executors were not entitled to become partners of the company, but they were entitled to sell or otherwise to receive from the company the value of Mr Laidlay's interest in the business. I ask what was sold? The interest of Mr Laidlay in this Indian firm was the subject of the sale. Accordingly, you have nothing here but the deceased's executors realising his interest in that Indian company, and therefore you have them realising an asset situated in India. Suppose this sale had happened to be to two gentlemen residing in Calcutta instead of being to the sons of Mr Laidlay at home, would the value of the property or interest have required to enter a Scotch confirmation in order to make it a good sale—a sale by persons having a title? I answer, plainly not; and the liability for probate-duty cannot depend upon the accident of whether the purchaser happens to be in this country or in India. The question is not from whom does the purchase money come, but where is the subject of the purchase belonging to the executry estate—the interest in the Indian business—situated?

But, as your Lordship pointed out, there is a farther provision in this contract, which, however, was not brought into operation in this case, by which, if the shares had not been sold, the company themselves, or the other partners, would have retained the interest of Mr Laidlay, as a shareholder in the company, and paid out the value of it. "The fair value of the share" is to be determined by Messrs Matheson & Company and paid over to the executors. In point of fact that was not done. What was done was simply the executors realising by a sale to partners who assumed the deceased's place in the copartnership. But suppose the company had themselves taken and paid for the shares, it does not appear to me that it would have made the slightest difference in the case. The company say, we will not allow executors to come into our copartnership, but surely the interest in the copartnership of the gentleman who has gone out remains, and though that interest is converted into a sum of money, it is a sum of money which represents his interest in an Indian firm, whether you call it assets, or a share of the assets of the firm, or his right to a share in the company. It is said that, if the company had so taken over the share, this would have created a contract debt,—and I suppose that would be so,—but that contract debt was not in respect of a share or interest in an English company but of an Indian company, and though the money might by arrangement or by contract be paid in this country, for the convenience of all concerned, the right or property in respect of which the payment would be made was situated in India. I am unable to see that if a man sells, either to a third party or to the company itself, a share of an Indian business, he is not thereby realising, as part of his estate, an asset which is situated in India. Article 25 of the contract no doubt bears that “the trustees of the partnership shall pay, or cause to be paid or secured, as hereinafter mentioned, the sum so determined”; but the obvious meaning of that is merely that they are to authorise payment. The funds of the company are all in the hands and under the management of the managing partners in India, who may no doubt require Matheson & Company to make advances when required. And the contract, in that article, goes on to provide at the close of it, “the funds to be paid by the said trustees of the partnership shall be provided by the partners rateably.” What is that but the purchase by the remaining partners of this company of Mr Laidlay's share in the Indian business? And in that view of the case the question always comes back to this, What is the nature of the asset sold or taken over? Is it an asset situated in India or not? It is said these trustees are in this country, and it is a payment from one person in this country to another. Well, if the trustees lived in India, would it make any difference? I apprehend not. Although it is a payment by one set of partners in this country to another, what is the payment in respect of? It is a payment in respect of a share in an Indian business. Therefore, it is an Indian estate, and therefore it is not liable to probate-duty in this country.

I have only farther to add that I think every one of the authorities referred to by the Lord Ordinary, or that were referred to in the argument, support the view that I have now stated. I have looked over them. The case of Fernandez's Executors was one of a contract debt, and the decision proceeded entirely on the view to which I should now give effect. A gentleman in India was receiving dividends from England. He died, and his executors desired to get the unpaid dividends free from probate-duty, but it was held that though a number of the assets of the company were in India the duty must be paid, because the company was an English company, and had its head office in England. That is precisely the principle which I apply to this case. Mr Hanson, in the passage which was referred to by Sir James Hannen in the case of Ewing (6 Prob. & Div. 19), says, at p. 160 of his book on Probate-Duties,—“Property which consists of shares in or claims upon any company or society must be taken to be locally situate in the place where the company has its head office, and to be bona notabilia accordingly.” And the passage which Lord Fraser has quoted in his note is to the same effect. Finally, in the case of Ewing Sir James Hannen says, with reference to an asset of Mr Ewing which was said to be situated in England, “I am not aware that the point has been the subject of judicial determination, but all analogies seem to lead to the conclusion that Scotland is the local situation of this asset of Mr Ewing. Thus the share of a deceased partner in a partnership asset is situate where the business is carried on, and shares in a company are locally situate where the head office is.” Now, the Lord Ordinary in quoting these authorities properly applied them, because he concluded his opinion by saying,—“The question always returns, which is the head office, and as regards the present case the Lord Ordinary must hold it to be London." If he had held that the head office of the company was in Calcutta his judgment would have been against the Crown. I do not understand that your Lordships hold that the head office of Robert Watson & Company is in London; and if the head office be in India, as I certainly hold it to be, then, according to all the authorities, a share of the business is an asset in India of the person who holds it. I am, on these grounds, of opinion, and although differing from your Lordships I am clearly of opinion, that this fund is not subject to probate-duty in this country.

July 12, 1889.
 Lord Advocate
 v. Laidlay's
 Trustees.

LORD ADAM.—The late Mr Laidlay died possessed of three shares in the company of Robert Watson & Co. These shares were sold by his representatives to his three sons, each getting one share, at the price of £27,000; and the question is whether or no this sum so realised by the trustees, and paid to them in this country, ought to have been included in the inventory of the moveable estate given up by the trustees in this country. As I understand the plea maintained against the giving up of these shares in this country is this, that they were shares in an Indian company, and being shares in an Indian company the assets were locally situate in India, and therefore did not require to be given up, and ought not to be given up in this country, but in India. Now, for my part I have not found it necessary to make up my mind at all whether the Lord Ordinary is right in saying that this is an English company, or whether Lord Shand is right in saying that it is an Indian company, because my opinion is entirely founded upon the 25th section of the contract of co-partnership, and would be the same whether this company is to be considered an Indian company or an English company. I think the 25th section is clear enough upon a little examination; and it appears to me that the most important section in it is the first, which provides that the representatives of a deceased partner shall not "become a partner in respect of any share of such partner," but the interest shall cease from the 30th of September after the partner's death. Now, there is a clear statement as matter of contract between the parties that the partnership should not be dissolved by the death of a partner, and that the representatives of the deceased partner should have no right whatever to become partners of the company. It humbly appears to me to follow from that, that in no view could the representatives of a deceased partner make up a title to the three shares which belonged to the deceasing partner. They could by no possibility do this, and so acquire a right to the property, or a share of the property, of the company of Robert Watson & Co. They had no such right under this contract. And accordingly it humbly appears to me that this is, if I may say so, where the fallacy of Lord Shand's judgment lies; because if it be the case, as I think it is, that these representatives never acquired themselves, and never could acquire, a right to the property of the company, which is clear from the contract, I think it follows that it does not matter in the least where that property is situated, whether it is held to be situated in India, or whether it is held to be situated in this country; because unless the representatives had a right of property in the assets of the company, I think it follows as a necessary consequence that the locus of the property of the company is immaterial in the case. That being so, the question comes to be what is to be done with these shares, and what right the representatives of these shares have. That right is set forth in the 25th section, that if they

No. 173. choose they may sell within six months after the death of the partner to a partner approved of by the committee, or if they do not choose to sell, they may have the value of the shares assessed or estimated by Messrs Matheson & Co., and the fair value having been so ascertained, the trustees, who are in this country, are to pay to the representatives of the deceased partner the amount or value of the shares as so ascertained. Now, in my humble opinion that is nothing but a contract debt against this company for a sum of money. It is not a claim or a sale of a right to a proportional part of the property of the company wherever it is situated. That is not the nature of the claim. In my humble opinion it is clearly and simply a claim of debt for a sum of money which the representatives have by this clause of the contract against the trustees in this country for payment of a sum of money. If that be so, I think there is no further question in this case about the local situation of the assets of the company. They are not selling, and have no power to sell, any right of property to these assets. That is not what is done here. But Lord Shand says there is no difference between that case and the sale of the same subject or the same right for a sum of money to the sons. It is the sale of a right to a sum of money paid to the executors in this country, and being a sum due and paid to them in this country, I can see nothing in this case different from the ordinary case of an asset in this country, realised in this country, and properly realised in this country, by the representatives of the deceased. That being so, I think it falls under the ordinary rule, and must be given up as an asset in this country. On that short ground I concur with your Lordship.

THE COURT adhered.

M'Grigor v. Beith, May 24, 1828, 6 S. 853, followed.

1ST DIVISION. IN 1819 John and David Young acquired, for a copartnership of which they were partners, certain subjects in Leith, consisting of four small houses, as part payment of a debt from a bankrupt estate. After their death the subjects were almost entirely neglected, until in 1862 Mr Williams, the proprietor of the adjoining tenement, put them into repair, and collected the rents, which he continued to do until his death in March 1887. After his death his testamentary trustees gathered the rents of the subjects, and paid the feu-duty and taxes.

Ld. Wellwood.
 C.

In August 1887 a petition was presented in the Court of Session by Mrs Ellen Waite, wife of Samuel Waite, Darlington, praying for the appointment of Alexander William Gordon, writer, Edinburgh, as judicial factor on the heritable subjects in question, "and that with all the usual powers; and, in particular, with power to sue for and receive the arrears of rents due from said subjects, he always finding caution in common form." The petitioner stated that she "is one of the next of kin of the said John and David Young; and until it has been ascertained who is their heir-at-law, desires that a judicial factor be appointed on the said property, with power to recover the rents and arrears of rents thereof, and to preserve the subjects from dilapidation." On 2d December following Mr Gordon was appointed judicial factor, "with all the usual powers." No. 174.

 July 16, 1889.
 Gordon v. Williams' Trustees.

Thereafter Gordon, as judicial factor, brought an action against Mr Williams' trustees for an account of their intromissions with the rents of the subjects in question and for payment of £500, or of such other sum as should be found to be the balance of their intromissions. He stated that Williams had drawn the rents of the subjects without any title or warrant of possession; that the present rental of the subjects was £15, 15s., which was a fair rent, and that it had been drawn by the defenders and their author from 1862 without there ever having been an accounting therefor.

The defenders admitted that the rents had been collected as stated by the pursuer, and that they were ready to account for them to the persons in right of the subjects. They further alleged,—“The persons at whose instance the petition for the pursuer's appointment as judicial factor was presented are not the heirs to the property, and have no right to the debt sued for in this action. They do not represent either John or David Young, both of whom died leaving children, while the persons at whose instance the pursuer was appointed are the representatives of a sister. Besides, the pursuer was only appointed judicial factor on the heritable property, to which any right he may have is exclusively limited, while the sum sued for is a debt due to the representatives in mobilibus of John and David Young, who now claim right thereto. In consequence of these conflicting claims the defenders have been obliged to raise an action of multiplepoinding, in order that all parties claiming right to the said fund may be convened, and their right thereto judicially determined.”

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) No title to sue. (2) In respect of the said action of multiplepoinding, the defenders are entitled to have the present action sisted until the right to the fund is determined therein, and to have this action conjoined therewith.

On 21st June 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Wellwood) repelled the defenders' first and second pleas, and ordained them to lodge accounts of their intromissions.*

The defenders reclaimed, and argued ;—What was sued for here was not arrears of rent, it was rather a sum of money which had come in the regular way into the hands of the defenders, who were holding it for the heir. The property had been deserted for many years. If the defenders were to meet the demand of the pursuer and the heir were afterwards to come and ask payment, the defenders would be bound to pay him a second time. They were thus not in safety to pay to the pursuer. The terms of the pursuer's appointment involved at the most that he was entitled to recover the rents and arrears of rent from the tenants themselves and to

* “OPINION.—The defenders' plea to title is rested on the ground that the pursuer has no title to sue for arrears of rent which were paid before his appointment to the defenders. In the circumstances, I think the plea is ill founded. The authorities relied on by the defenders, Swinton v. Gawler, 20th June 1809, F.C., M'Grigor v. Beith, 6 Sh. 853, were cases in which the rents had been paid, before the factor's appointment, to persons who had a colourable title to receive them, e.g. as heir or executor. Here, while the defenders and their author may have acted excusably in collecting the rents, they had no colourable title. They really acted as self-appointed factors loco absentis, and were therefore bound to account to the pursuer, on his appointment, for their intromissions, deducting, it may be, sums bona fide expended on repairs, taxes, &c.”

No. 174. preserve the subjects from dilapidation. The case of M'Grigor<sup>1</sup> was in point, and the judicial factor here, as there, was endeavouring to turn his factory into a trust for creditors.

July 16, 1889.
Gordon v.
Williams'
Trustees.

Argued for the respondent;—The case of M'Grigor<sup>1</sup> was distinguished from the present. There the rents which were sought to be brought within the factory were in the hands of a person who had a good title to them, and who had uplifted them by desire of one of the children of the deceased. That was further a case of sequestration, as opposed to a judicial factory. That was also the state of the fact in Gawler's<sup>2</sup> case. The rents of which the judicial factor there sought to obtain possession had been uplifted by the executor of the deceased in good faith before the sequestration. But here the defenders had had no title to uplift the rents, and were vitious intromitters,<sup>3</sup> and the defenders had no title to hold the rents they had so collected as against the judicial factor appointed for the purpose of preserving the estate. Besides the estate was for the purposes of this case moveable, the rents being partnership property. In a sequestration the theory was that a judicial factor should not get what was in the hands of others having a good title.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The only question of the smallest difficulty in this case is the question relating to the title of the judicial factor to sue the action of count and reckoning. The title of that officer depends upon the terms of the extract of his appointment. It is stated in the petition for his appointment that the petitioner, Mrs Waite, "is one of the next of kin of the said John and David Young, and until it has been ascertained who is their heir-at-law, desires that a judicial factor be appointed on the said property, with power to recover the rents and arrears of rents thereof, and to preserve the subjects from dilapidation." Accordingly, the prayer is that Mr Gordon should be appointed judicial factor on the heritable subjects in question, "with all the usual powers; and, in particular, with power to sue for and receive the arrears of rents due from said subjects, he always finding caution in common form." The interlocutor appointing Mr Gordon to be factor, the terms of which appear from the extract, bore that he was to be factor "with all the usual powers." That interlocutor accordingly was not in terms of the prayer of the petition, because it did not give him in particular power to sue for arrears of rents. Whether that fact is of importance or not, I am not prepared to say. Special powers were not necessary to enable him to protect the subjects for the heir; one of the few usual powers belonging to a factor is to collect the rents from the tenants; but in the present case, the rents sought to be recovered are not now due by the tenants, but the persons who are sued are intromitters with the rents who are liable to account to the heir; and the question is whether such a factor is entitled to proceed against these intromitters for recovery of these rents without special powers.

I can see no ground for a distinction between this case and that of Beith (6 S. 853). That was a case of a sequestration, but I do not think that fact makes any difference. The factor could not sue for anything under the terms of his appointment but the rents, and the only thing he can sue for here is the rents in the hands of the tenants. If the fact that there was a sequestration in that case and not in this is immaterial, as I think it is, we must look at the way in which the Court disposed of the case of Beith. The defender pleaded that although the judicial factor "might be entitled to recover arrears from tenants, he had no title to sue third parties, intromitters with rents prior to his appointment." That is the very class of debt which the present factor wishes to recover. The ground of judgment in Beith's case is well expressed by Lord Glenlee. "This is an attempt to turn a factor into a trustee for creditors. If, after the date of the factory a party intromits with rents, the factor may have some ground for suing him, but he never can bring an action against all and sundry for previous intromissions."

No. 174.
July 16, 1889.
Gordon v.
Williams' Trustees.

I therefore think that, looking to the authority of that case, and the very sound principle upon which it was decided, the title to sue in the present case ought not to have been sustained, and that the action ought to be dismissed.

LORD MURE concurred.

LORD SHAND.—I have also come to be of the same opinion with your Lordship. No doubt persons who intromit with the rents of a property, and have drawn these rents, as the defenders have done in this case for many years, are bound to account for them to the proper heir who has at length appeared. On the other hand, the title of the judicial factor is a limited one; it is a title to preserve and look after the estate, and to intromit with the rents. He would be entitled to sue any tenants still in possession who were in arrear, for this would be covered by the terms of his appointment. But it is a totally different matter when he proposes to sue other persons who have intromitted with the rents by uplifting them from the tenants, at least without special powers, and I do not think the pursuer had any right to involve the estate in litigation for recovery of rents in that position.

LORD ADAM concurred.

THE COURT recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, sustained the first plea in law for the defender, and dismissed the action.

Succession—Power of Apportionment.—A lady who had a power of apportionment of a fund provided by her husband in their marriage-contract in liferent to herself and in fee to the children of the marriage, became party to a bond and assignation in security, whereby one of the sons, in security of a loan, assigned his interest under the marriage-contract to the lender, and his mother, in farther security, apportioned to her son one-fifth of the fund and declared the apportionment to be irrevocable. She died leaving no other deed expressly bearing to be an exercise of the power. By her trust-disposition and settlement she left a legacy of £100 to one of her daughters, and appointed the residue of her estate to be divided equally among her children other than this daughter, declaring that these provisions should be in full satisfaction "of all claims competent to them on my decease, whether legally or under my marriage-contract, or in any other manner of way." In a special case, held that the bond and assignation in security contained a valid exercise of the power of apportionment to the extent of one-fifth of the fund; that the trust-disposition and settlement dealt with the lady's Bowie's Trustees v. Paterson.

M.

THE late William Bowie, by his antenuptial contract of marriage with Miss Annetta Antonia Louisa Thurburn, dated 7th September 1840, inter alia, bound himself to provide and secure by insurance on his own life or otherwise the principal sum of £4000 sterling, and to take the rights and securities thereof to himself and his then promised spouse, and to the survivor, in conjunct fee and liferent for her liferent use only, and to the child or children of the marriage in fee; and it was farther declared that, in case there should be more than one child of the said intended marriage, it should be in the power of the said William Bowie, at any time of his life, to divide and proportion, as he should think proper, among the said children, the above provision in their favour, and in case of his death without making any such division, this wife, if she should survive him, was to have the same power; and failing any such division, the provision was to be divided among the said children equally.

By mutual trust-disposition and settlement, dated 9th May 1849, and registered 13th March 1857, Mr and Mrs Bowie, on the narrative of the foresaid antenuptial contract of marriage and obligation above mentioned, and that the said William Bowie had effected two policies of insurance on his life, amounting together to £3000, assigned the same to his said wife in liferent, in the event of her surviving him, and to the child or children of the marriage in fee, under the like powers of apportionment, and failing its exercise among the children equally.

Mr Bowie died on 5th January 1856, without having exercised the power of apportionment reserved to him under these deeds. He was survived by his wife and by six children.

Mrs Bowie died on 23d January 1888 leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 12th May 1877, by which she conveyed her whole estate, heritable and moveable, real and personal, then belonging, or that should belong, to her at the time of her death, to trustees for the purposes therein specified. One of the purposes was for implementation, so far as the same might not have been implemented, of the obligations by her contained in the antenuptial contract of marriage. By the trust-disposition and settlement Mrs Bowie also directed her trustees to pay to her daughter Mrs Marizza Bowie or Paterson the sum of £100 sterling, and to pay the residue of her whole estate, heritable and moveable, to or for behoof of her whole children who survived her, other than the said Marizza Bowie or Paterson, in such shares or proportions as she should direct and appoint by any writing under her hand, failing which, in equal shares, "which provisions in favour of all my said children shall be in full satisfaction to them of legitim and executry, and of all claims competent to them on my decease, whether legally or under my said marriage-contract, or in any other manner of way." Mrs Bowie left moveable estate to the amount of £9584, 10s. 11d.

Mrs Bowie left no other testamentary writing or other writing under her hand dealing with her estate, but she had become party to a bond and assignation in security, dated 2d November 1883, granted by her son John Mure Bowie in favour of the Scottish Life Assurance Company for the sum of £500, whereby the said John Mure Bowie assigned to the company, in security of the loan, All and Whole his right and interest, present and future, in and to the sums of money and others held in trust under the mutual disposition and settlement, in so far as the same might then belong or thereafter become payable to him. The bond and assignation in security then continued as follows, viz.:—"And I, the said Annetta Antonia Louisa Thurnburn or Bowie, having regard to my right of apportionment or disposal of the funds and others held in trust as aforesaid, and considering that I have, for the farther security of the said company, agreed to exercise now in favour of my said son the said John Mure Bowie the rights and powers conferred upon me by the said mutual settlement . . . . Therefore I have apportioned, and do hereby apportion, to the said John Mure Bowie, and to his heirs and assignees, a sum of not less than one-fifth part or share of the foresaid sum of £4000" (provided as above in the marriage-contract) ". . . And in case of the trustees in whom the said funds and property are now or shall be vested being unable from any cause to implement the foresaid apportionment, which I hereby declare to be irrevocable, except with the consent of the said company, then I bind and oblige myself, out of my own proper means and private estate, to make payment to the said John Mure Bowie or his foresaids at my death of such sum as may be requisite to make up his share to the amount above apportioned to him."

No. 175.

Bowie's Trustees v. Paterson.

On the death of Mrs Bowie her daughter, Mrs Marizza Bowie or Paterson, applied to the trustees under the mutual settlement, requesting them to divide the whole of the marriage-contract funds and estate into six equal shares, and to make payment to her of one share thereof along with her five brothers and sisters. She maintained that both her father and her mother died without exercising their power of apportionment. The trustees maintained that Mrs Bowie by her trust-disposition and settlement, and the bond and assignation in security, validly exercised the power of appointment reserved to her under the marriage-contract and mutual disposition and settlement, and that the funds and estate held by the trustees should be divided into five shares, one-fifth whereof should be paid to John Mure Bowie, and the remaining four-fifths divided equally among the other four children, excluding Mrs Paterson.

This special case was accordingly presented, the trustees under the mutual settlement being the first parties, Mrs Paterson being the second party, and the other children of Mr and Mrs Bowie (or their representatives) the third parties.

The following were the questions:—" (1) Whether the first parties, the said trustees, are bound to divide the trust-estate equally among the whole children of the marriage of Mr and Mrs Bowie? or (2) Whether the deeds referred to contain a valid appointment of one-fifth of the said trust-estate in favour of John Mure Bowie, the balance being unappointed? or (3) Whether the said deeds contain a valid appointment of the whole trust-estate, to the effect of excluding the party of the second part from any right to a share of the same, and dividing it among the parties of the third part as follows, viz., one-fifth to John Mure Bowie, and four-fifths equally among the other four children of Mr and Mrs Bowie, or those in their right?"

Argued for the first and third parties;—I. There was a good apportionment, to the effect of giving John Mure Bowie one-fifth of the fund, leaving the other four-fifths to be divided equally among Mrs Bowie's four children other than John Mure Bowie and Mrs Paterson. It was the intention of Mrs Bowie to give Mrs Paterson nothing beyond the £100 out of what she had power to test upon, whether her own estate or that subject to the power. That £100 would come out of Mrs Bowie's own estate. The donee of a power might exercise it by a general settlement, making no reference to the power.<sup>1</sup> It was no matter that the testatrix had estate of her own which might of itself satisfy the words of her will. She was entitled to mass it with that over which she had the power, and must be presumed to have done so. II. In any view, there was a good appointment of one-fifth to John Mure Bowie in the bond and assignation in security even if the remainder of the fund was unappointed.

Counsel for the second party was not called on on the first point. On the second it was argued for the second party that there was not a good appointment even of one-fifth. The alleged appointment was either a matter of contract as between the parties to the assignation, in which case it was conditional and temporary, and would fall if the loan were paid up to the assurance company, or otherwise it was a testamentary appointment contained in that assignation. If so, it was recalled by the settlement of Mrs Bowie, which, though dated before the assignation, took effect at Mrs Bowie's death in 1888, and as between her and John Mure Bowie recalled the alleged appointment, for it revoked "all deeds of a testamentary character formerly executed by me."

LORD YOUNG.—There is no real difficulty here. The whole case lies in a nutshell. The fund settled by the husband under the marriage-contract is given to the wife in liferent should she survive her husband, and to their children in fee. The husband had a power of apportioning the fee, and in the event of his failing to exercise this power, the wife had a similar power, and failing her exercising it, the fund was to be divided among the children equally. The husband never exercised the power of apportionment conferred on him, and the question is whether a bond and assignation in security granted by one of the sons on 2d November 1883, to which the wife became a party, contains an effectual exercise of the power by the wife. I see no reason to doubt that it does. It bears to be an exercise of the power to the extent of one-fifth of the fund. It was no doubt executed for a special and temporary purpose, but nevertheless I think it is a good exercise of the power to the extent of one-fifth. Then is there any further exercise of the power? None is suggested except this lady's will; but her will contains nothing of the kind. It gives a legacy of £100 to one of her daughters. It is now admitted that that legacy is to be paid out of her own estate. And then there is only the direction to divide her estate equally among her children, but that is no exercise of the power at all. I am therefore of opinion that this fund has been apportioned to the extent of one-fifth to John Mure Bowie, and that the remainder has not been apportioned at all.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK, LORD LEE, and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords . . . are of opinion that the deeds . . . contain a valid appointment to John Mure Bowie of one-fifth of the estate held by the trustees under the antenuptial contract of marriage, and that the remaining four-fifths of said estate fall to be divided in five equal shares among the party of the second part and the parties of the third part other than the said John Mure Bowie,—that is to say, one-fifth to Mrs Marizza Bowie or Paterson, one-fifth to the trustees and assignees under the indenture of settle-

The defenders reclaimed, and moved the Court to order the cause to be

The defenders argued;—The reclaiming note was competent under sec.

Reclaiming notes against such interlocutors were recognised in practice.<sup>1</sup> The Lord Ordinary had applied his mind to the question whether the trial should be before a jury, and had decided the matter; to send the case back to him was therefore absurd.

Argued for the pursuer;—This reclaiming note, even if competent, was quite superfluous, for when the Lord Ordinary had adjusted the issues the whole cause might be brought up by reclaiming note.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—This reclaiming note may be technically competent, but it is not of a class to be encouraged. It is a reclaiming note against an interlocutor closing the record, and assigning a day for the adjustment of issues. Such an interlocutor in no way precludes the Lord Ordinary from considering and deciding the question whether the cause is to be tried on issues or before himself alone without issues. That question is still open. The result of allowing this reclaiming note, therefore, might be first that there is this reclaiming note on the question whether issues should be allowed, and then another reclaiming note, after the Lord Ordinary has adjusted the issues, upon the form of the issues. I see no reason why the Lord Ordinary should not have an opportunity of finally exercising his discretion in the matter before the case comes here, and I am therefore for refusing this reclaiming note.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I abstain from expressing any opinion on the competency of such a reclaiming note as we have here, but I think that a reclaiming note against such an interlocutor ought at once, and as of course, to be dismissed, because, if competent, it is only accidentally so.

The requirements of the Act of Parliament have not been exactly followed

Section 28.—"Review of certain interlocutors of the Lord Ordinary.—Any interlocutor pronounced by the Lord Ordinary as provided for in the preceding section, except under subdivision (1), shall be final, unless within six days from its date the parties, or either of them, shall present a reclaiming note against it to one of the Divisions of the Court by whom the cause shall be heard summarily; and when the reclaiming note is advised, the Division shall dispose of the expenses of the reclaiming note, and of the discussion, and shall remit the cause to the Lord Ordinary to proceed as accords: Provided always, that it shall be lawful to either party within the said period, without presenting a reclaiming note, to move the said Division to vary the terms of any issue that may have been approved of by an interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary, specifying in the notice of motion the variation that is desired: Provided also that nothing herein contained shall be held to prevent the Lord Ordinary or the Court from dismissing the action at any stage upon any ground upon which such action might at present be dismissed according to the existing law and practice."

in this case. The Lord Ordinary after closing the record should have asked the parties whether they renounced probation; if they did not, as I suppose would be assumed here, the Act provides,—“If the parties shall not agree to renounce farther probation, the Lord Ordinary shall appoint the cause to be debated summarily at the end of the motion-roll on a day to be then fixed, before which day the parties shall respectively lodge the issue or issues, if any, which they propose for the trial of the cause, and the Lord Ordinary, after hearing parties, shall on the said day determine whether farther probation shall be allowed.” The more regular course, therefore, would have been to appoint a day on which the cause was to be summarily debated before the Lord Ordinary, and not to appoint a day on which issues were to be adjusted. But the Lord Ordinary did appoint a day for the adjustment of issues, and “this day week” from the date of the interlocutor was the day appointed. Then the statute goes on,—“If the Lord Ordinary shall think that further probation should be allowed, and that it should be taken before a jury, he may, without adjournment, proceed to adjust issues for the trial of the cause, and pronounce an interlocutor approving of the issue or issues which have been so adjusted.” So that on that day week, if he had been of opinion that the cause was one to be tried by a jury, he would have adjusted issues for the trial. Then the statute says that such an interlocutor shall be final unless the parties, or one of them, shall present an interlocutor to one of the Divisions of the Court, before whom the cause shall be debated summarily. If, therefore, on that day week the Lord Ordinary had adjusted issues, it would have been open to either party to reclaim. Why then should it be necessary to reclaim against this interlocutor appointing issues to be adjusted? I think it is an extravagant reclaiming note. The case must go back to the Lord Ordinary. I say nothing about the course he is to follow. It is open to him to decide anything he pleases after hearing the parties, and whichever of the parties he decides against may reclaim against his judgment. I am, without hesitation, for dismissing this reclaiming note, and with expenses.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD LEE concurred.

THE COURT refused the reclaiming note, adhered to the interlocutor reclaimed against, and remitted to the Lord Ordinary to proceed.

JOHN SEIVWRIGHT, Berlin warehouseman, Aberdeen, applied for and had allotted to him 120 shares of the Swedish Match Company, Limited, in terms of the prospectus. To his letter of application he appended the words,—“If capital all subscribed for.”

The following is an excerpt from the prospectus:—“Share capital, £100,000, in 20,000 shares of £5 each. First issue £80,000, in 16,000 £5 shares. . . . In addition to the above shares, £30,000 of six per cent debentures, secured as a first charge upon the property and undertaking of the company, to be issued, . . . The consideration to be paid by the company for the whole of the before-mentioned property, together with goodwill, has been fixed by the vendor at £90,000, of which £55,000 is payable in cash, and the balance £35,000 in fully paid shares, debentures, or cash, or partly in each, at the option of the directors, but the vendor desires to have allotted to him the largest possible number of shares, having regard to the rules of the Stock Exchange relating to quotations. This will leave for working capital, stock, and extension of plant, £20,000.”

In an action raised by the company in the Sheriff Court at Aberdeen against Seivwright for payment of calls, the defender, inter alia, averred;—(Stat. 4) “Defender believes and avers that when said alleged allotment of one hundred and twenty shares was made to him, the whole of said first issue of £80,000 was not applied for nor subscribed, and was not allotted. The defender believes and avers that the amount subscribed for and allotted at that date amounted to about £67,000 only. The condition under which his application was made not being fulfilled, no valid allotment was made to him, and his application therefore fell.”

The defender pleaded;—(3) The defender’s said application having been made conditional to the capital being all subscribed for, and this condition not having been fulfilled at the date of said alleged allotment to him, he is entitled to repudiate the said allotment, and to be assoilzied from the conclusions of this action.

A proof was allowed. It appeared from the evidence that of the first issue of 16,000 shares 13,563 had been allotted to the general public by the date of the defender’s letter of allotment. Of the remainder, it was in the option of the company to allot 2400 to the vendor in part payment of the price of the works, &c., made over to the company, but no actual allotment of these 2400 shares appeared to have been made at the date of the allotment to the defender. The balance of thirty-six shares was retained in case of inaccuracies, in accordance with the usual practice. It was not disputed that if the vendor’s shares were to be held as allotted the whole 16,000 shares had been allotted.

The whole of the £30,000 of debentures had not been subscribed for at the date of the allotment to the defender.

On 12th November 1888 the Sheriff-substitute (Dove Wilson) “Finds that the defender applied for shares in the pursuers’ company upon the condition that the capital was subscribed for: Finds that the capital has not been all subscribed for; and therefore assoilzies the defender from the conclusions of the action,” &c.*

 Swedish

 Limited, v.
 Seivwright.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I regret that I cannot agree with the view of either of the Sheriffs. I take the stipulation in the defender's letter of application, "if capital all subscribed for," to apply alone to the capital which was then offered for subscription. I cannot accept the Sheriff-substitute's view that it was intended to refer to the whole capital of the company, whether then issued for subscription or not; nor can I accept the view of the Sheriff that the word dition is. The pursuers treat it as if it meant that the shares were to be taken if the whole of the first issue was subscribed for. That is not what it says, and I can see no ground for so interpreting it. It says distinctly, 'if capital all subscribed for,' and the meaning of that is plain. It matters little to the defender whether the capital was issued in one or half a dozen different issues, but it mattered a good deal to him whether the whole or only a part was taken up. If the whole were taken up, it would not be necessary to call up the full amount of each share, whereas it might be if only part were taken up. In the prospectus the capital was distinctly stated at £100,000, and the condition in the application could have reference to nothing except that. It may be argued that the word 'capital' in the condition must be taken as equivalent to first issue, inasmuch as nothing else was being offered at the time for subscription. This argument is insufficient. The words 'capital' and 'first issue' are not equivalent, and the prospectus is silent as to when the second issue was to be made. It was free to the pursuers to deal with the defender's application as they pleased, and if they thought fit to entertain an application conditional upon all the capital being subscribed for they must abide by the condition. Only £80,000 in round numbers has been subscribed for in place of the £100,000 mentioned in the prospectus. Plainly, therefore, if I have rightly understood the condition, it has not been complied with. . . ."

* "NOTE.—The defender, in applying for shares, made it a condition that he should not be bound to take them unless the 'capital was all subscribed,' and the first question in the case is, what is the meaning of the word 'capital,' as used by him in his letter of application? The Sheriff-substitute has read it 'share capital,' and if such is its meaning, I should have thought that it could only relate to the shares about to be issued, not the shares which the company was empowered to issue, but which they might never find it necessary to issue. In other words, the application would mean, 'If all the shares which you are now offering to the public are taken up, I am willing to take so many,' and as they all were taken up, the defence would fail. But, in my opinion, this is not the sense in which 'capital' is used in the documents which have now to be considered. The proposals contained in this prospectus in substance and effect amounted to this. The company were to buy certain match factories in Sweden for £90,000, payable £55,000 in cash, and £35,000 in shares. The shares to be first issued were only for £80,000, and as it would require £10,000 more to pay off the vendor and £20,000 for working capital, or together £30,000, this was to be raised by debentures, which were offered for public subscription in the same prospectus and along with the shares. Unless the promoters were able to raise the whole £110,000 by debentures and shares, they would not be able to go on. When, therefore, the defender stipulated that the whole capital should be subscribed, he must have meant both share and debenture capital, and it is in favour of this view, and also of his perfect bona fides, that in his letter of 3d December 1887, acknowledging the letters of allotment, he desires to be informed if all the shares and 'debentures had been subscribed for by the public.' It is not disputed that this was not the case. The shares had been taken, but not all the debentures, and I therefore affirm the Sheriff-substitute's judgment, although I am unable to agree with him in the grounds on which he has proceeded. . . ."

No. 177. "capital," while it was intended to include only the amount then offered for subscription, included not merely the share capital, but a large amount of debentures. According to the ordinary use of language debentures are not capital. They may sometimes be so treated as to be fairly called capital, but that is not the case here. These debentures were issued on the ordinary footing of the company receiving money from the public on loan, in consideration of paying a fixed percentage for its use. So understanding the word "capital," we must take the case on the footing that the amount of the capital to which the defender's letter of application referred was 16,000 shares, and if these 16,000 shares were all truly subscribed for within the time mentioned in the letter, then the condition is fulfilled, and the defender is bound.

July 16, 1889.
Swedish
Match Co.,
Limited, v.
Seivwright.

Now, there is no doubt that 13,000 odd shares were subscribed for by the public before the day of allotment, and as regards the balance, the question is whether the 2400 allotted to the vendor must be held to be shares subscribed for or not. In my opinion they were. They were shares which the company could allot to the vendor if they pleased. He was not in a position to insist on having them allotted to him, for the company might have paid him in cash if they had the money, but he was bound to take the shares if the company chose to allot them to him. I think therefore that the whole capital of the company was subscribed for in the sense of the defender's letter of application, and that he is in consequence bound.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree.

As to the meaning of the word "capital," I think that there cannot be two opinions, and that the Sheriff was quite wrong.

I further think that all the capital was subscribed for by the day of allotment, because the company were then in a position to issue the 16,000 shares of which the capital consisted to persons who were under obligation to take them. These persons were first, members of the public who had applied for shares in the ordinary way, and secondly, the vendor who was bound to take the shares allotted to him.

LORD LEE concurred.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"The Lords having heard counsel for the parties on the appeal, find in fact (1) that on 29th November 1887 the defender paid to the pursuers' bankers £60, being 10s. per share on 120 shares of £5 each in the pursuers' company, and made application to the pursuers for an allotment to him of that number of shares, in terms of letter of application by the defender, of that date, No. 7 of process; (2) that at said date, the amount of capital issued by the company was £80,000 in 16,000 shares of £5 each; (3) that it was a condition of the defender's application that the said 16,000 shares should be subscribed for before allotment to him of the shares applied for; (4) that on 30th November 1887, 120 shares were allotted by the pursuers to the defender; (5) that at the last-mentioned date said 16,000 shares were subscribed for, and the said condition was thereby purified; (6) that it is not proved that the defender was induced to apply for said shares by misrepresentations on the part of the pursuers; (7) that, by his said letter of application, the defender undertook to pay the further instalments upon his shares

Reparation—Master and Servant—Statute—Construction of statute—Factory and Workshop Act, 1883 (46 and 47 Vict. cap. 53), secs. 2, 3.—The Factory and Workshop Act, 1883, enacted (by sec. 2), that it "shall not be lawful to carry on a white lead factory unless such factory is certified by an inspector to be in conformity with this Act," and (by sec. 3) that a white lead factory shall not be so certified unless certain conditions specified in the schedule to the Act have been complied with.

At the date of the passing of the Act the expression "white lead" denoted carbonate of lead, a substance very soluble and therefore dangerous to the health of workmen engaged in its manufacture. After the passing of the Act there was invented a process by which a sulphate of lead having the same appearance and fitted for the same uses could be manufactured. It was sold as white lead. It was nearly insoluble, and was not dangerous to the workmen engaged in its manufacture, if certain simple precautions were observed.

A workman who, when engaged in a sulphate of lead factory, suffered from lead-poisoning sued his employers, whose factory was not certified under the Act, for damages, founding on their alleged neglect to conform to the provisions of the Act and to take the various precautions specified in the schedule. Held, after a proof (diss. Lord Lee), that the sulphate of lead was not "white lead" within the meaning of the Act, and that the provisions of the Act, in regard to white lead factories, did not apply; et separatim, that it had not been proved that the pursuer's illness was caused by the failure of the defenders to take proper precautions for the protection of their workmen.

JAMES CREEVY, a labourer, was employed by Hannay's Patents Company, Limited, Glasgow, from July 1887 to June 1888.

Lanarkshire.
I.

In September 1888, having left the service of Hannay's Patents Company, Creevy raised an action in the Sheriff Court against them for £250 as damages for bodily injury alleged to have been received through their fault.

The pursuer averred that the defenders carried on the manufacture of white lead, or at least of a product similar in appearance thereto, and of the same dangerous character, and that they had failed to comply with the conditions of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1883* (46 and 47 Vict.

cap. 53, sec. 3), in consequence of which he had begun to suffer from lead-poisoning after working in the factory for about six months, and had continued so to suffer till compelled to leave off working. He further averred alternatively that the defenders, being engaged in the manufacture of a dangerous product, had failed to take such precautions as were necessary to prevent injury to those engaged in the manufacture thereof.

The pursuer also averred that during the first six months of the period during which he was employed at the works of the defenders the conditions of the schedule were not complied with, in respect that the factory was not properly ventilated, but that thick vapour was allowed to arise during the drying process; that the place set apart for the men to wash was not satisfactorily constructed or kept clean, and that a pipe conveying white lead into the condenser passed through that room, and was in a condition so leaky as to allow fumes of white lead, and sometimes even white lead, to escape into the room; that no towels were supplied, and that hot water, soap, and brushes were not regularly supplied, and that the brushes even when supplied were not in a fit condition; that no place separate from the working-rooms was provided for meals; that no overall suits, head coverings, or respirators were supplied; and that acidulated drink was not regularly supplied.

He further set forth that during the last five months of his service these matters were in certain respects improved, but that the defects were not completely remedied.

The defenders denied that they had violated any statutory or other duty to the pursuer. They explained that they manufactured "a white pigment by means of a patented process which is analogous in other respects to the process of smelting lead, and the product which they make of lead, though popularly known as 'white lead,' does not contain the same chemical properties as ordinary white lead. The defenders' product is a pure sulphate of lead, which is a non-poisonous salt of lead, and is innocuous." They averred further that the pursuer failed to follow the

"(2) A Secretary of State may at any time by writing under his hand revoke, alter, add to, or modify, all or any of the conditions specified in the schedule to this Act."

Sec. 4 provides for the obtaining by the occupier of a white lead factory, "after inspection to ascertain whether the scheduled conditions have been complied with, of a certificate that the factory is in conformity with the Act."

The Act further provides (sec. 6), "that the occupier of a white lead factory who carries it on without such a certificate shall be liable in a penalty," and (by sec. 7), "that such special rules shall be established in every white lead factory for the guidance of the persons employed therein as may appear best calculated to enforce the use by them of the requirements provided under the Act, and generally to prevent injury to health in the course of their employment."

By sec. 11 printed copies of the special rules were to be posted up in the factory in conspicuous places.

The schedule referred to provides,—"(1) The stacks and stoves in the factory must be efficiently ventilated. (2) There must be provided for the use of the persons employed in the factory sufficient means of frequently washing hands and feet with a sufficient supply of hot and cold water, soap, towels, and brushes. . . . (4) There must be provided for the use of the persons employed in the factory (but not in any part of the factory where any work is carried on) a proper room for meals. (5) There must be provided for every person working at any tank an overall suit with head covering, and a respirator or covering for the mouth and nostrils. (6) There must be accessible to all persons employed in the factory a sufficient supply of acidulated drink."

medical advice he received from the doctor at the works, that he refused to make use of the appliances supplied by them to prevent lead poisoning, and in particular refused to wear a respirator and overalls. They explained that he had injured his hand by an acid, which caused the skin to come off, and that he continued to work with his hand in that condition, and so was peculiarly susceptible to lead poisoning. Creedy v.
Hannay's
Patents Co.,
Limited.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia ;—(1) The pursuer's health not having been injured through the fault or negligence of the defenders, they are entitled to absolvitor. (2) The pursuer's injuries having been caused or materially contributed to by his own fault or negligence, the defenders are not liable to him in damages. (5) The defenders not being bound by the conditions prescribed in the Act founded on, are entitled to absolvitor.

A proof was led. With regard to the nature of the substance manufactured by the defenders, it appeared that the substance manufactured and known as white lead at the date of the passing of the Act was carbonate of lead, which was commonly called "white lead." Certain of the requirements laid down by the schedule had relation to the chemical nature of the substance. Thus the object of the supply of acidulated drink to the workmen, mentioned in the 6th condition in the schedule, was to turn the carbonate of lead which might have got into the system of a workman into sulphate of lead. The danger of the carbonate of lead was that it was soluble when in contact with the acids in the juices of the body, and the object of the acidulated drink was to turn it into sulphate of lead, which is nearly insoluble, after which, by other medicines if necessary, it could be carried out of the body. The defenders, by a process for which they held a patent, had succeeded in producing at a price cheap enough to compete with carbonate of lead a sulphate of lead of somewhat the same appearance, and suited for the same uses, which they sold as Hannay's White Lead. It was admitted that this substance, though it was only soluble to the extent of one part in 23,000, was not absolutely non-poisonous, but the skilled evidence led for the defenders shewed that it was only poisonous to a very slight extent, and in a different way from the ordinary white lead or carbonate of lead, and that with reasonable cleanliness on the part of those using it, and the use of respirators to prevent it entering the lungs, it was perfectly safe. The defenders' manager admitted that up to the time pursuer was injured he had understood that their product fell under the denomination of white lead, and that they were bound to have the precautions scheduled in the Act, and to have special rules. The defenders had no certificate such as the Act required in white lead factories, but they had applied for one before the pursuer was injured, and they had published in the works an abstract of the Act.

The evidence was conflicting as to whether the defenders had supplied the articles required to be provided by the Act, assuming it to apply, but a majority of the Court were of opinion that they had done so.

The pursuer was proved to have suffered in health while in the defender's employment, and his symptoms were those of lead-poisoning. The defenders' witnesses attributed his illness to his refusing to wear the respirator supplied to him, notwithstanding that their secretary and manager had both urged him to do so. Alternatively, they attributed his illness to his having a sore upon his hand, and having absorbed lead by that means, in consequence of unnecessarily placing his hand in contact with lead instead of using the tools supplied to him.

There was evidence that other workmen had suffered from lead-poisoning during the same period as the pursuer.

It was proved that for at least a part of the time during which the pursuer was in the service of the defenders, the "meal-room" was also used as a store, so that there was not a separate place for meals. It was, however, proved that the pursuer did not take his meals at the works, but at his home.

Mr Hannay, the director of the defenders' company (whose evidence is quoted, infra, in the opinion of Lord Lee), deponed in his examination that he had been informed by an inspector of factories that he was not working under the White Lead Act (i.e., the Factory and Workshops Act, 1883), but under the Factory Act, i.e., the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, 41 Vict. c. 16. No inspector, however, was called as a witness.

It was proved that the first condition mentioned in the schedule to the Act of 1883, viz., that the stalks and stoves in the factory must be efficiently ventilated, was inapplicable to the defenders' works, as they had no stalks or stoves.

On 5th January 1889 the Sheriff-substitute (Spens) found that while engaged in the defenders' works the pursuer contracted lead-poisoning, but found it not proved that the lead-poisoning was due to the fault of the defenders. He therefore assolizied the defenders.*

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and argued;—(1) The pursuer suffered from lead-poisoning. The substance the defenders manufactured was white lead. They called it such; it was made from lead; it served the same purposes as ordinary white lead. The one question therefore was whether they used the appropriate precautions and had obtained the appropriate certificate. The latter they admittedly had not done. The proof shewed that they had failed in the former. They had, however, admitted the obligation to use proper preventive measures by their partial use of them, and indeed their manager admitted that he had thought himself bound to supply them. It was said that they did not make the white lead of commerce, which they defined to be carbonate of lead, but a new kind of lead which was a sulphate. But the statute did not define white lead as a carbonate, or indeed in any way. It was a statute to guard against dangers in making "white lead." Besides, the sulphate as well as the carbonate was injurious (even if the defenders succeeded in proving that it was much less so). Its consequences were therefore within the mischief which the Act was passed to remedy. The statute ought on ordinary principles of statutory construction to be construed so as to strike at the danger arising from this new substance as well as those arising from the older substance.<sup>1</sup> (2) Even if the statute were held to be inapplicable, the pursuer's case at common law was that the defenders were in fault in not providing sufficient precautions for the safety of their men. In either view of the case, it lay on them to prove the defence that the pursuer received his injury, which was certainly the result of lead-poisoning, from his own fault, and in this they had failed.

Argued for the defenders;—The Factory and Workshops Act, 1883, did not apply. When it was passed, carbonate of lead was the only white lead of commerce. The precautions of the Act were intended as precautions against a carbonate. But the defenders' white lead was a sulphate, and never in the whole process was a carbonate. For that reason the sixth precaution—that as to acidulated drink—could not apply. Nor could the first, for it was to ensure the ventilation of stalks and stoves, of which none were used in producing the sulphate. The necessities of the manufacture of the old white lead were not the same as those of the manufacture of the new substance. It was not "white lead" within the meaning of the Act. That reduced the inquiry to one whether the defenders had discharged their common law obligation to take reasonable precautions in the circumstances, and the proof shewed that the manufacture of the sulphate was so little a cause of danger that if the pursuer had used the means supplied he would have been perfectly safe, and that his injury arose from his not doing so.

At advising,—

LORD YOUNG.—This is an appeal from the Sheriff-substitute in an action of damages, by a workman in a factory for injury to his health in consequence of neglect on the part of his master to use proper measures in his premises for the health of his workmen. The action is raised both under the Statute 46 and 47 Vict. c. 53, regulating the manufacture of white lead, and also at common law. The Act 46 and 47 Vict. c. 53, requires certain precautions to be taken by those having white lead manufactories, which the defenders are said to have neglected.

There are two questions raised with reference to the statute, as far as this case is based on the statute. The first is whether the statute is applicable to the defenders' work, and the second is, if it is so, whether the state of the pursuer's health is attributable to the defenders' neglect of its provisions.

The judgment of the Sheriff-substitute is against the pursuer on both these questions, and it is to the effect that the statute is not applicable, this not being a white lead factory. The article manufactured is a kind of white lead no doubt. It serves as a substitute for it, but the weight of the evidence is I think to the effect that this article is not white lead within the meaning of the Act—is not of the character of the white lead to which the Act applies. That is a question on which I should have been unable to form a judgment without the evidence of scientific people, or of people versed in this trade and this article, but that evidence is that this is not white lead, or possessed of those dangerous qualities in its manufacture which the statute contemplates in making the provisions it does applicable to white lead factories.

I therefore agree with the Sheriff-substitute that the statute is not applicable.

The second question is whether, if the statute is applicable, the injury to the pursuer's health is attributable to a failure on the defenders' part to comply with its provisions, and on that question I agree with the Sheriff-substitute that it is not. I think all the provisions required by the statute were taken by the defenders, and that the state of the pursuer's health is not attributable to neglect on the defenders' part, supposing the statute is applicable.

That disposes of the case under the statute. As to the case made at common law, I am of opinion that it is not proved as matter of fact that the damage is attributable to any fault on the defenders' part, or that they neglected any reasonable and therefore proper precautions.

I therefore think the action is unfounded in fact, not being supported by the evidence, and that the judgment of the Sheriff-substitute should be affirmed.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK concurred.

LORD LEE.—I think that this case is attended with difficulty, but I have been unable to arrive at the same conclusion with your Lordships.

No. 178. The facts which I consider to be proved are these : 1st, That the work carried on at the defenders' factory is the production from lead of a white pigment which they call "white lead." 2d, That the production of this pigment as there carried on is attended with the danger known as "lead-poisoning." 3d, That the pursuer, as well as other men employed in the works, suffered from such lead-poisoning. 4th, That it is not proved that the pursuer's illness was caused by his own fault or by any fault to which he materially contributed. 5th, That the lead-poisoning of the pursuer is reasonably accounted for and must, on the evidence, be ascribed to, the fault of the defenders in neglecting to observe the provisions of the Factory and Workshops Act, 1883, which was considered by the managers, to whom the matter was left, to be applicable.

July 16, 1889.
Creevy v.
Hannay's
Patents Co.,
Limited.

With regard to the obligations undertaken by the defenders in employing their workpeople, I observe that Mr Hannay, the patentee of the process, and the defender's director, states in answer to the question how far the requirements of the Act were carried out at the works, "That has always been left more to the manager and heads of the departments, but I have given general instructions to see that everything was given to the men that they wanted." And Mr Tervet, the manager, states,—“I understood then we were compelled by the Act of Parliament and by the special rules to have the respirators, and that the men should wear them. Up to the time the pursuer was injured I was certainly of the opinion that this product of ours fell under the head of white lead.”

It is also proved by the manager's evidence, and by the facts of the case, that the product as manufactured at these works is not non-poisonous.

If therefore I could upon any technical ground reach the conclusion that the Act applies only to the production of carbonate of lead, I should think that employers in the position of the defenders, who knew the necessity of precautions and proposed to take them, incurred an obligation at common law to see to the protection of workmen employed by them, on the footing that they accepted the responsibility of using such precautions.

But this is a point which in my view does not require to be decided. For I think that the Factory and Workshops Act, 1883, on a sound construction applies to the defenders' factory. The statute makes it unlawful to carry on a "white lead factory" excepting under the conditions required by the Act. These conditions are not merely the scheduled conditions but such amended, additional, or modified conditions as the Secretary of State under section 3 may see fit to approve of or impose; and it is required further that special rules shall be adjusted for "every white lead factory" to be approved of by the Secretary of State. These special rules are to be framed and transmitted by the occupiers of the particular factory; and provision is made for the publication and amendment of such special rules in the case of each factory, and also for the enforcement of them against the workpeople as well as against the manufacturer.

It is said however, that the expression "white lead factory" in the statute applies only to a factory for the production of carbonate of lead. There is nothing in the interpretation clause to support this limited construction of the expression; but it is said that the article known as white lead at the date of the statute was carbonate of lead, and the sixth of the schedule conditions requiring that "a sufficient supply of acidulated drink" shall be accessible to all persons employed is said to prove that carbonate of lead is in view.

I assume that the ordinary white lead of commerce at the date of the Act was carbonate of lead, and that it was specially in view of the Legislature at that time. But in my opinion this is not a sufficient ground for holding that the statute used the expression "white lead factory" in any such limited sense.

No. 178.
July 16, 1889.
Creery v.
Hannay's
Patents Co.,
Limited.

The expression "white lead factory" in my judgment requires construction. It may be construed, I admit, as applying only to a factory for the production of what was then commonly called "white lead," viz., carbonate of lead. But it can only be so construed by the aid of evidence that the only white lead of commerce then known was carbonate of lead. I think, however, that the expression by itself is capable of including, and may reasonably be construed as applicable to, any factory for the production of any white lead the manufacture of which is attended with the risks which were intended to be corrected. My opinion is that to every such factory the enactment is applicable that it shall not be carried on excepting under conditions approved of by the Secretary of State and subject to the statutory inspection.

I apprehend that the general rule is well settled, that a remedial statute of this kind is to be interpreted if possible so as to apply to all forms of the mischief against which it is directed. I do not say that the words can be disregarded. But I think that the sense is chiefly to be regarded, and that, if the words admit of it, that meaning is to be accepted which renders the statute applicable rather than such a limited meaning as would make the statute easily evaded, and indeed inapplicable to any but one mode of producing the mischief.

The defenders' white lead, though not carbonate of lead, and not so soluble nor so poisonous, is in my opinion a kind of white lead the manufacture of which according to their process produces the same injurious consequences; and I think that the principle of construction applied in the case of The Queen v. Smith (1 Crown Cases, p. 266), and also in the case of Taylor v. Goodwin (4 Q. B. Div. p. 228), is sufficient to bring it within the scope of the Factory and Workshops Act, 1883, as to white lead factories.

It was argued that the evidence negatived this view, because Mr Hannay states that the inspector informed him that he was working under the Factory Act and not under the White Lead Act. Even if the inspector had been examined and had deponed upon oath to his opinion that the statute was inapplicable, I could not myself have attached much weight to his opinion in the absence of cross-examination and of information as to the position of the inspector. If it was merely one of the local inspectors of factories (as to whose qualifications the statutes make no very strict provision) it would be entitled to very little weight either upon the legal or upon the chemical questions which have been raised.

But as mere hearsay by the witness Mr Hannay I feel bound to reject the statement as altogether incompetent and valueless.

The only other argument against the application of the statute which I think it necessary to notice is that some of the scheduled conditions are inapplicable to this factory, particularly Nos. 1 and 6. But I think that the third clause of the Act contemplates the case of a factory as to which the Secretary of State may find it necessary to revoke, alter, or modify "all or any of the conditions specified in the schedule," and to adapt the statutory conditions to the circumstances of the particular factory.

If the Act of 1883 is applicable to the defenders' factory the position of the case is this; that the defenders have carried on the work without enforcing its provisions or obtaining any special rules for the management of the works and the government of their workpeople. In such circumstances it appears to me

No. 178. that they are not entitled to blame the workpeople for not asking for things, or for not using things which were supplied. Therefore even if there were more evidence than there is that everything was supplied which could be wanted, I should think that the defenders were in fault in not enforcing the provisions of the Act, and in neglecting to provide themselves with the statutory means of doing so, and I should hold, in the absence of any other proved cause of the pursuer's illness, that their negligence in this respect was the cause of the lead-poisoning from which the pursuer and others suffered.

July 16, 1889.
Creedy v.
Hannay's

But I think it right to say that in my opinion the evidence of the sufficiency of the ventilation of the drying-house, and the supply of clothing and of cleansing accommodation, is far from satisfactory. There is a considerable weight of evidence against the defenders on these points.

The attempt to prove that the pursuer's illness must have arisen from an injury to his hand has in my opinion entirely failed.

On these grounds I should have held it proved that the pursuer's illness was caused by the fault of the defenders.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with the majority of your Lordships. At the time the Act was passed on which the pursuer founds there was only one known article of commerce called white lead. That was an article of well-known properties and composition. Carbonate of lead was the only salt of lead which up to that time had been produced in such quantities and at such a cheap rate as to be applicable to the purposes for which white lead is used. We know the properties of that white lead and the risks accompanying its manufacture on account of its being highly soluble and in certain parts of the process fuming in a manner highly injurious to the human system. It was therefore thought desirable that regulations should be made by statute to protect workmen engaged in its manufacture. Now, these regulations must have had a bearing upon the chemical composition and properties of the article. That this was so is clear from what was prescribed to be done. For example, in every white lead manufactory there must be supplies, in convenient places in the works, of acidulated water for the men to drink, to counteract any poison they may have taken in by their breath or swallowed, so that the soluble carbonate may be turned into the insoluble sulphate and thus be rendered innocuous.

It is perfectly plain that where an Act prescribes such precautions having reference to a chemical product, it may be not only inexpedient but dangerous to bring under the Act another product which for commercial convenience may be known by the same name but is of different chemical composition. Here the substance produced in the defender's process is a sulphate, and to supply more sulphuric acid could not only do no good but might do harm. No doubt, as Lord Lee has pointed out, the Home Secretary has power to modify the requirements of the statute in certain cases, but I should be much surprised if he were advised to apply to a new product regulations which he is entitled to make for the old one. I think nothing can be more clear than that the whole legislation dealing with the manufacture of white lead had reference to the manufacture of one particular salt, and should not be applied to a new and different chemical product.

The new article is called white lead because unless it were so called it would not be bought as a substitute for the old substance. It is called so not because of its composition but to indicate that it may be used as a substitute for the old white lead of commerce. Formerly no one could supply a safe and cheap sulphate substitute for the dangerous carbonate of lead, whereas if such a sulphate were once produced at a cheap rate it would effect not only a saving in price but would also lessen the danger to those persons who have to use a salt of lead as a pigment. Now, by an ingenious process this sulphate has been produced at a sufficiently cheap rate, and it is called "white lead," with the maker's name in front. That is not conclusive of the question, but I think the majority of your Lordships are right in holding that this is not white lead in the sense of the statute, and that the statute does not apply.

Now, as to the common law, I am not satisfied that in the manufacture of ordinary sulphate of lead there is any risk if workmen take ordinary precautions for themselves. I think the defenders supplied all sufficient appliances, except that up to a certain date they had no proper separate room for the men to take their meals in. Had it been the case that the pursuer suffered in health from taking his meals in an unsuitable room, it might have been held that the defenders were responsible. But this defect in the arrangements could not have been the cause of any injury to the pursuer, who invariably went home to his meals.

On these grounds I agree with the majority of your Lordships that the judgment in the Court below was right.

THE COURT pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find in fact (1) that the substance manufactured by the defenders is not white lead within the meaning of the Act 46 and 47 Vict. c. 53; and (2) that it is not proved that the injuries sustained by the pursuer in his health and constitution resulted from any neglect or failure on the part of the defenders to take proper precautions for the protection of their workmen: Find in law that the provisions of the foresaid Act are not applicable to the factory of the defenders, and that they are not liable, either under said Act or at common law, to compensate the pursuer for the said injuries: Therefore dismiss the appeal, and affirm the interlocutor of the Sheriff-substitute appealed against: Of new assolkzie the defenders from the conclusions of the action: Find them entitled to expenses in this Court," &c.

Bell v. Hamilton's Trustees.

Proof—Secondary evidence—Skilled witnesses—Value of colliery.—In an action of reduction of a mortis causa trust-settlement and codicil on the ground of facility and circumvention, the Court granted a warrant ordaining the defenders to allow an inspection of the plant, machinery, and working plans of certain collieries—a large share in which belonged to the trust-estate—the object being to obtain evidence of their value for the purposes of the pursuers' case.

JAMES HAMILTON, a coalmaster in Glasgow, died on 27th August 1888, when he was seventy-five years of age, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, dated 7th April 1874, with two codicils appended, dated 7th May 1877 and 18th December 1882. Under these deeds the truster provided for an equal division of the annual proceeds of the undivided residue among his whole children (three sons and three daughters), issue of a predeceasing child taking their parent's place, and upon a dissolution

Bell v. Hamilton's Trustees.

By a codicil of 14th June 1888, and a trust-disposition and settlement of 6th July 1888, the truster reduced his daughters' provisions to a life-rent of a sum of £5000.

The daughters, or their representatives, brought an action of reduction of the last two deeds against the trustees, alleging that their father had been induced to sign them by the fraud and circumvention of one of his sons.

The pursuers stated the value of the truster's estate at the time of his death at £120,000. The defenders stated it at £50,000.

An issue was adjusted, and the cause was set down for trial at the sittings at the close of the Summer Session.

The pursuers moved the Court for a warrant ordaining the defenders to allow an inspection of the plant, machinery, and working plans of the collieries by two mining engineers "in order to estimate the value of the said plant, machinery, and collieries."

The defenders opposed the motion, urging that the pursuers would get all the information to which they were entitled from the balance-sheets of the business, the inventory of the deceased's personal estate, and the business books of the firm. All that could reasonably be asked, or was required at this stage, was a general view of the value of the collieries, so as to compare the estimates by the truster and his sons respectively. An inquiry of the kind asked might be competent if the deeds were reduced, but not at the present stage. In any case, the working plans ought not to be put into the hands of other parties.

THE COURT granted the motion.

Duthie's Trustees v. Forlong.

This was a special case presented by (1) Miss Duthie's trustees, and (2) Mrs Catherine Low or Forlong, one of Miss Duthie's residuary legatees.

The questions of law were,—“1. Are the parties of the first part entitled or bound to make immediate payment in cash to the party of the second part of the share of residue bequeathed to her under the said trust-deed of settlement and codicils? Or, 2. Are the parties of the first part bound to hold the capital of the said share of residue until the death of the second party, paying to her in the meantime the annual proceeds, and on her death to make over the capital to her heirs or executors?”

The first parties maintained that they were not in safety to pay over to her the fee of the share of residue falling to Mrs Forlong, while she maintained that she was entitled to immediate payment notwithstanding the declaration above quoted.

Argued for the first parties;—No doubt the trustees here had alternative courses open to them. They might either hold or invest, but on the first alternative the second party had to meet the recent case of Christie's Trustees,<sup>1</sup> on the second alternative she had to meet the former case of Duthie.<sup>2</sup> The case was not within that of Jamieson.<sup>3</sup>

The second party was not called on.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think that this case is ruled by that of Jamieson, not by that of Christie.

LORD YOUNG.—I am of the same opinion. I think this lady must have her money, but I am not surprised that the trustees should have brought this case into Court. Indeed it was their duty to do so. It is a very nice question. A very small difference of expression determines the point whether a direction intended for the benefit of the proprietor shall be disregarded as repugnant to the truster's intention, or whether it is operative and may be carried out. If the property is given to any one, any direction as to the mode of dealing with it would be generally void from repugnancy. There are cases, of which Christie's may be taken as an example, although not by any means a perfect one, where the giver may constitute a protection by keeping the fund out of the hands of the object of his bounty, and putting it under the care of managers of his own appointment. There are such cases in which it would certainly be operative, but here there is no operative restraint upon the proprietor. I think the property is here distinctly and absolutely given, and that the restrictions as to exclusion of jus mariti and preserving the capital for the beneficiaries' own heirs and executors are not operative, and cannot be given effect to. They are repugnant to the gift proper.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK and LORD LEE concurred.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—“Answer the first of the questions stated in the case in the affirmative, and the second question in the negative: Find and declare accordingly.”

IN March 1889 Wright & Greig, wholesale wine and spirit merchants in Glasgow, brought an action against the Glasgow Herald newspaper for damages for alleged slander.

The pursuers averred that in 1884 they had engaged a person named Smyth to act as their traveller, and to manage their office in London; that in 1887, having discovered Smyth to be behind in his accounting with them, they had taken a bill from him for £619, 14s. 9d., being the amount due by him to them; that in February 1888 they had dismissed him from their service; and that in June 1888 he became bankrupt. (Cond. 5) “Upon the 22d January 1889 an application was made by Smyth in the London Bankruptcy Court for an order of discharge. The pursuers had instructed their London solicitor, Mr Wilde, to appear on their behalf before the Registrar and oppose Smyth’s application for discharge. Mr Wilde accordingly appeared on the pursuers’ behalf. Smyth was examined, and he and Mr Wilde having addressed the Registrar, the latter pronounced judgment, suspending the order of discharge for fifteen months; and on the following day, the 23d January 1889, there appeared in the Glasgow Herald a paragraph, purporting to give a report of the proceedings in the London Bankruptcy Court relative to Smyth’s discharge, which contained, inter alia, the following passages:—‘In examination by Mr Wilde the bankrupt stated that he came to London in 1884 as traveller for Messrs Wright & Greig of Glasgow. He remembered giving them a bill for £619. He did not know that that represented moneys received by him and not handed over. All he knew was that they were very hard up, and he had financed them from time to time. It was not right for Mr Wilde to make the wide allegations he had done against him. . . . The bankrupt, in addressing the Court, said that there was not the slightest truth in the allegations made by the petitioning creditors. It was a matter of account between them, he having made advances to them from time to time to enable the business to be carried on, and being repaid when the accounts came in.’” (Cond. 6) “The said paragraph gives a false and misleading account of the proceedings which took place in the London Court of Bankruptcy on the occasion in question. The bankrupt did not say, as is represented in the said paragraph, that the pursuers ‘were very hard up, and he had financed them from time to time.’ Nor did he say, as is represented in the said paragraph, that ‘he had made advances to the pursuers from time to time to enable their business to be carried on.’ These statements were utterly false and calumnious, and, in point of fact, were not made by the bankrupt.” (Cond. 9) “The said paragraph was, in the particulars set forth, false, misleading, and calumnious. It was not a fair and impartial report of the proceedings in the Bankruptcy Court, but was incorrect and one-sided, in respect that it contained the statements above mentioned, which were not, in fact, true or made by the bankrupt; and, further, it suppressed statements made by the bankrupt and by the solicitor for the pursuers in the course of the proceedings, which corrected and put the true complexion on the whole transactions between the pursuers and the bankrupt—an entirely different complexion from that which the said paragraph gave to the public.”

Wright &
Greig v. Outram & Co.

In answer the defenders averred that their report was a fair and honest summary of what took place in the public Bankruptcy Court in London.

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The defenders having slandered the pursuers, by printing the said false and calumnious statements, are liable in reparation and damages, as concluded for. (2) The defenders having slandered the pursuers by the publication of a garbled, partial, and one-sided report of the said proceedings in the London Bankruptcy Court as condescended on, are liable in reparation and damages, as concluded for. (3) The said report, not being a fair and accurate account of the said judicial proceedings, was not privileged.

The defenders pleaded;—(1) The pursuers' statements are irrelevant. (2) The pursuers' material averments being unfounded in fact, the defenders should be assoilzied. (3) The defenders not having slandered the pursuers as alleged, should be assoilzied. (4) The said notice, being a fair summary of the proceedings in a public Court, and having been published without malice, is privileged, and the defenders should therefore be assoilzied.

The pursuers proposed the following issue:—“Whether, on or about the 23d January 1889, the defenders published in the Glasgow Herald an article or paragraph in the terms of the schedule hereunto annexed: Whether the statements therein set forth are of and concerning the pursuers, and falsely and calumniously represent that the pursuers were in financial difficulties, and were being financed by means of accommodation bills and advances of money by a person named Smyth, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?”

The defenders proposed the following counter issue:—“Whether the statement printed in the schedule hereto is a fair abridgment of the proceedings in the Court of Bankruptcy, in London, on 22d January 1889?”

On 18th June 1889 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) approved of the issue, and disallowed the counter issue.*

* “OPINION.— . . . I have come to the conclusion that the pursuers' issue may stand as proposed; and further, that no counter issue is necessary.

“I think it clear that the innuendo in the issue is relevant—the innuendo being that the reports in question represented ‘that the pursuers were in financial difficulties, and were being financed by means of accommodation bills and advances of money by a person named Smyth.’ I cannot doubt that it is defamatory to make and publish such a statement with respect to a commercial firm, and I do not consider that the case of Robertson, upon which the defenders relied, raised any question at all analogous to the present. I further think it is not doubtful that the innuendo is borne out by the reports complained of. In point of fact, the innuendo is almost a literal echo of certain expressions in the report. And, with respect to the defenders' criticism upon the pursuers' record, it may be true that the record should, as matter of pleading, have not only set out the report complained of, but should have also set out in terms the proposed innuendo. But I do not consider that that is matter of substance. The record might easily be amended to make it square with the issue, but I cannot see that that is necessary. I therefore think that the action lies, and that an issue must be granted; and, moreover, that this issue sets out quite a relevant and proper innuendo.

“But then comes the question whether the terms of the issue otherwise are such as are suitable to a case of this description. The defenders contended that, upon

The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—(1) The pursuers' issue went beyond their record, for there was no innuendo set forth on the record, and the words in the report founded on were certainly not libellous in themselves. But (2) further, they could not fairly bear the innuendo set forth in the issue. It was not libellous to say of a business man that at some past time he had been in financial difficulties (assuming that the report fairly read meant that, which it did not); to cause him any damage the statement must refer to his present condition,<sup>1</sup> but the issue was "were" in financial difficulties, and "were" being financed. (3) If, however, the report contained a slander, it was a fair and accurate report of what took place in a Court of Justice, and consequently the pursuer must take an issue of malice<sup>2</sup>; at least the defenders were entitled to have their counter issue allowed in order to put the point sharply before the jury.

Argued for the pursuers;—It was plainly a libel to say falsely of a business man or firm that he was in financial difficulties. If it was necessary that the innuendo should be averred on record, the pursuers were willing to amend,* and they were also willing to amend the issue so as to refer to both the present and the past. "Were" was ambiguous, and did not in the issue refer to the past, but the pursuer was willing to insert "had been or."† There was no presumption that a newspaper report was fair the pursuers' statement, it sufficiently appears that this was a newspaper report of a public proceeding—that it was therefore prima facie privileged—and that being so, that the pursuers were bound to put in issue, and to prove, that the report was not fair and accurate. Now, I am not of that opinion. I do not consider that any privilege attaches to a newspaper report as such; neither am I aware of any presumption, either in law or in fact, that a newspaper report is fair and accurate. The privilege attaching to a newspaper report only, I think, arises where the report is fair and accurate, and the fairness and accuracy of the report must be proved, and cannot be assumed; although, no doubt, when the fairness and accuracy of the report is proved, the privilege becomes an absolute privilege, and is a complete defence to an action. I am therefore of opinion that the pursuers are not bound to take any other issue than the ordinary issue, putting the question whether the report contains false and calumnious statements to their damage.

"That leaves only the question of the necessity of the counter issue, and I do not think that either party pressed seriously for such an issue; and I am very unwilling to introduce into this department of practice a complication for which it is admitted there is no precedent. For my own part I do not consider that a counter issue is, in a case of this kind, appropriate. In the general case where a slander is published or circulated, the person who publishes or circulates the slander is held to adopt it, and is constructively in the same position as the slanderer. But the case of a fair and accurate newspaper report is different. There the newspaper is neither actually nor constructively the slanderer, and the newspaper's defence, I think, quite fairly arises by way of denial of the pursuer's issue. In that view no counter issue is necessary. The Judge who tries the case will be bound to tell the jury that, if it appears that the report is a fair and accurate report of a public proceeding, the pursuers have failed to prove their issue, and the defenders are entitled to a verdict. . . ."

* The pursuers obtained leave to amend cond. 6 of their record by deleting from "in point of fact" to the end of the article, and inserting in place "falsely and calumniously represented the pursuers to be persons who were in financial difficulties, and had been or were being financed by means of accommodation bills and advances of money by the said Smyth."

and accurate, and consequently the defenders were not entitled to require No. 181.
malice to be put in issue; if they proved their report to be fair and accurate it would be for the Judge at the trial to direct the jury as to their privilege. The counter issue ought not to be allowed. It was an unprecedented course to use a counter issue as the means of directing the attention of the jury to a particular point; that was the duty of the Judge at the trial.

At advising,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I agree with the Lord Ordinary that there is no need for a counter issue, and I also think that the issue as adjusted is sufficient for the trial of the cause. I am entirely against cramming into an issue or counter issue special points with the view of directing the attention of the jury to them as if they were the crucial points of the case. It is the duty of the Judge at the trial to instruct the jury on such points.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I agree. I do not think that a counter issue is necessary. If the report of the proceedings in the London Bankruptcy Court turns out to be a fair and accurate report, then the defenders must prevail. It would be impossible in that case to hold that the report is false and calumnious. But I agree that that is a matter for the direction of the Judge at the trial, and not for the issue.

LORD LEE.—I entirely concur in thinking that we should not put anything unnecessary in issue. I think we may decide that there should be no counter issue on this ground, that the issue of the pursuers as it stands sufficiently raises the question whether the words complained of were falsely and calumniously reported, and not merely whether they are in themselves false and calumnious. On the understanding that that is the meaning of the issue, I agree that it is unnecessary to have anything more.

LORD YOUNG was absent.

THE COURT approved of the issue, and disallowed the counter issue.

DUNCAN CAMPBELL, lessee of the Golden Lion Hotel, Stirling, died on 18th March 1887, predeceased by his wife, and survived by a son, James, and by two daughters, Elizabeth (Mrs Mackenzie) and Mary (Mrs Irons).

Mr Campbell left a trust-disposition and settlement dated 10th March 1881, by which, after giving his trustees power to accumulate the income of the trust-estate (which consisted wholly of personal property), he, in the third place, provided,—“On my means and estates having accumulated as aforesaid, or as soon thereafter as my trustees may find convenient, I direct and appoint my trustees to pay, convey, and make over to my son, James Campbell, presently residing in New South Wales, and his heirs, executors, and representatives whomsoever, the sum of £2000 sterling; declaring, as it is hereby specially provided and declared, that my trustees, should they see fit, and deem it necessary to do so, shall retain said sum in their own hand for behoof of the said James Campbell, and pay him the interest annually derived therefrom, in such portions and at such time or times in the year as they see proper, and of which they shall be the sole and only judges; declaring further, as it is hereby specially declared, that in the event of my trustees retaining said sum for behoof of my said son as aforesaid, the interest to be derived therefrom shall be purely alimentary, and shall neither be liable for the debts of my said son, nor subject to the diligence of his creditors.”

The truster then, in the fourth place, directed his trustees to hold the residue of his estate for behoof of his daughters Mrs Mackenzie and Mrs Irons, “equally between them in liferent for their respective liferent uses allanarly, and on the death of either of my daughters” to “pay and make over the fee applicable to such daughter's liferent to her heirs and successors, equally amongst them, share and share alike, but declaring that no part or portion of the share of said residue falling to the respective heirs of the said two liferentresses shall become payable to any of said respective heirs until such heir shall have attained the age of twenty-one years complete; . . . declaring, as it is hereby specially provided and declared, that the provisions herein conceived in favour of my children are in full to them of all claim competent against my estate, and that in the event of any of my children creating any dispute in regard to these presents the child so acting shall forfeit all claims competent to him or her under the same, and my trustees are hereby directed to deal with such child's share, in the event of it being that falling to my son, in the same manner as I have appointed in regard to the residue of my means and estate; and in the event of its being in regard to the share conceived in favour of either of my daughters, then to hold the half of such share for behoof of my other daughter in liferent, and pay the fee of the same to her heirs as aforesaid, and to pay and make over the other half to my said son and his heirs, or retain same for his behoof as aforesaid."

Campbell's
Campbell.

By codicil, dated 5th July 1884, the truster directed and appointed his trustees, "in place of paying, conveying, and making over to my son, James Campbell, before designed, the sum of £2000 sterling, or any other or farther sum which may happen to fall to him in virtue of my said trust-disposition and deed of settlement, to retain said sum in their own hand for his behoof, and pay him the interest annually derived therefrom, in such portions, at such time or times in the year, as they see proper, and of which they shall be the sole and only judges; declaring that the interest to be derived from said sum shall be purely alimentary, and shall neither be liable for the debts of my said son, nor subject to the diligence of his creditors; and at his death I appoint my trustees to pay and make over the said sum of £2000 sterling to his heirs and representatives whomsoever, equally amongst them, share and share alike."

Mrs Mackenzie claimed her legitim, and received payment thereof.

Questions having in consequence arisen, this special case was presented. The trustees were the first parties; James Campbell, the truster's son, was the second party; Mrs Mackenzie and her husband, and Mrs Irons and her husband, were the third and fourth parties respectively; the minor children (with consent of their curators) and the tutors of the pupil children of Mrs Mackenzie were the fifth parties; and the children of Mrs Irons were the sixth parties.

The second party contended that Mrs Mackenzie's children had no separate or independent interest in the share of residue directed to be liferented by her, but only a contingent and derivative interest in so far as they might happen to be her heirs and successors at her death; that such interest had fallen or been forfeited by their mother's election to claim her legal rights; and that in consequence he was entitled to one-fourth of the residue over and above the special provision of £2000. Alternatively, he contended that he was entitled to be paid the income of one-fourth of the residue during Mrs Mackenzie's life over and above the special provision.

The fourth and sixth parties contended that Mrs Mackenzie's children had no separate or independent interest in the share of residue directed to be liferented by her, but only a contingent and derivative interest in so far as they might happen to be her heirs and successors at her death; that such interest had fallen or been forfeited by their mother's election to claim her legal rights, and that consequently the first parties were bound to hold one-half of the share of residue so forfeited for behoof of the fourth party in liferent, and to pay the fee of the same to her heirs. At all events, these parties maintained that if the rights of Mrs Mackenzie's children had not been so forfeited, the income of the share of the residue destined to her and her heirs and successors vested in the first parties during her lifetime, and fell to be applied by them in compensation of the legitim received by her; or otherwise, that one-half of the said income fell to be paid by the first parties to the fourth party during her

No. 182. July 17, 1889.
Trustees v.
Campbell.

life; and further, that the said share of the free residue must contribute to satisfy Mrs Mackenzie's claim of legitim.

The fifth parties contended that the prospective rights of Mrs Mackenzie's children were not forfeited by their mother claiming her legal rights, and that the income of the share of residue destined to her and her heirs and successors fell to be accumulated by the first parties during her lifetime for the benefit of the other beneficiaries who had suffered by Mrs Mackenzie's election of her legal rights, in so far as their respective rights had been diminished in consequence of her election, and, inter alios, for the fifth parties.

The third parties maintained that, if the rights of Mrs Mackenzie's children had been so forfeited, the fee of the one-half of the share of residue destined to Mrs Mackenzie, of which James Campbell, in consequence of her election, would have the liferent, must be held to have fallen into intestacy of the truster, and fell to be divided amongst his next of kin as at the date of his death, including Mrs Mackenzie.

The questions of law were:—“(1) Are the children of Mrs Mackenzie entitled to have the share of residue directed to be liferented by her set aside for behoof of her heirs and successors at her death, notwithstanding that she has elected to claim her legal rights? (2) If the first question is answered in the affirmative, does the income of the share of residue which would have been liferented by Mrs Mackenzie fall to be accumulated during her lifetime, in order to make up the shares of residue to what they would have been had she not claimed her legitim, or does it fall to be divided between the second and fourth parties, or to whom does it fall to be paid? (3) If the first question is answered in the negative, is the second party entitled to the fee or the liferent of the half of the residue forfeited by Mrs Mackenzie, and are the first parties bound to hold the other half of the residue so forfeited for behoof of the fourth party in liferent and her heirs in fee? (4) In the event of the second party being only held entitled under the answer to question 3 to the liferent of the said half of residue, does the fee thereof become intestacy of the testator, and is Mrs Mackenzie entitled to share therein?”

Mr Patten, advocate, was appointed curator ad litem to the fifth parties.

Argued for the second party:—(1) In regard to the consequences of Mrs Mackenzie's repudiation of the settlement, the case was not within Fisher v. Dixon,<sup>1</sup> and cases of that class.<sup>2</sup> The terms of the deed, according to the only reasonable construction, shewed that it was the testator's intention that if any child repudiated, not only that child but his or her heirs and successors should forfeit their interest under the settlement. (2) The fee of one-half of the share of residue set free by Mrs Mackenzie's repudiation fell to the second party. It was only the £2000 originally given to him which the trustees were directed to hold for his behoof during his life, and to pay over to his heirs and representatives on his death. The repudiated share neither fell into residue nor became intestate succession;<sup>3</sup> it was expressly disposed of by the will; and the concluding clause of the codicil did not apply to the second party's share of it. There was further no room for the doctrine of equitable compensation, the testator having himself directed what was to be done with the repudiated share.

The fourth and sixth parties adopted the argument of the second party on the first branch of the case, but as regarded the repudiated succession they argued that it fell to be divided among the beneficiaries who had not by themselves or their parent repudiated according to their several interests in the succession, the income of the repudiated share being applied in compensation of the legitim claimed by Mrs Mackenzie.<sup>1</sup>

The fifth parties argued that their right in the fee was not affected by Mrs Mackenzie's repudiation, and that the liferent set free by her repudiation was to be applied in compensation of her legitim.

The third parties argued that the share set free by Mrs Mackenzie's repudiation fell into intestacy, and that she as one of the heirs ab intestato was entitled to a share thereof.

At advising,—

LORD LEE.—The first question in this case is, whether the children of Mrs Mackenzie, who claimed her legitim in preference to taking the benefit of her father's settlement, are entitled to have the fee of the share appointed to be liferented set aside for her heirs and successors?

It was not disputed that unless the deed provides otherwise the fee which is directed to be paid to her heirs and successors is not forfeited by the daughter's repudiation of her liferent. The cases of Fisher v. Dixon, 10 S. 55, and Snoddy's Trustees, 10 R. 599, leave no room for doubt on that point.

But it was contended that the directions of the deed in this case provide for the case which has happened in such a manner as to defeat the interest of the heirs and successors of the daughter who has repudiated.

The declaration is that the child creating any dispute shall forfeit all claims under the deed, "and my trustees are hereby directed to deal with such child's share . . . in the event of its being in regard to the share conceived in favour of either of my daughters, then to hold the half of such share for behoof of my other daughter in liferent, and to pay the fee of the same to her heirs as aforesaid, and to pay and make over the other half to my said son and his heirs, or retain the same for his behoof as aforesaid."

I think it impossible to doubt that a daughter's share is here dealt with as including the interest of her heirs and successors. For the fee previously appointed to be paid to them is here directed to be otherwise disposed of in the event contemplated. If therefore Mrs Mackenzie has so acted as to create a dispute under the deed (which appears to me to be the case), there is in the event which has happened no direction to pay the fee to her heirs and successors on her death. The original direction to that effect has been superseded. I think therefore that the first question in the case must be answered in the negative.

But a further question is raised as to that portion of the forfeited share which was by the original deed directed to be paid or made over to the son and his heirs, or retained "for his behoof as aforesaid." The difficulty arises in consequence of a codicil executed by the testator on 5th July 1884. It is clear that under the original deed the son took a fee in his portion of the forfeited share, just as he took a fee in the £2000 which was to be paid to him in his own right, subject to certain power of retention. The effect of the testator's original directions as to his interest in the forfeited share are that it was either to be paid to him or retained for his behoof in like manner as the £2000 was to be paid or retained. But the effect of the codicil is to take away from the trustees, both as to the £2000 and also as to the son's half of the forfeited share, the power of paying the money to the son, and to direct them to retain the amount in their own hands for his behoof. The words of the codicil are, that in exercise of his powers of alteration, "I," the testator, "do hereby direct and appoint my trustees, in place of paying, conveying, and making over to my son James Campbell, before designed, the sum of £2000 sterling, or any other or further sum which may happen to fall to him in virtue of my said trust-disposition and deed of settlement, to retain said sum in their own hands for his behoof, and pay him the interest annually derived therefrom, in such portions, at such time or times in the year, as they see proper, and of which they shall be the sole and only judges; declaring that the interest to be derived from said sum shall be purely alimentary, and shall neither be liable for the debts of my said son nor subject to the diligence of his creditors, and at his death I appoint my trustees to pay and make over the said sum of £2000 sterling to his heirs and representatives whomsoever, equally amongst them, share and share alike."

It is noticeable that there is no express revocation of the fee conferred on the son by the original deed, and no declaration that the capital sum is not to be subject to his debts. Nor is there any direction that the capital shall be dealt with at his death in a manner inconsistent with the fee being vested in him.

The direction is only that the sums shall be retained for his behoof to the effect of making the interest available for his aliment.

Now, I think that there is no repugnancy between such a direction and the vesting of a fee. And the result is that there being no revocation, express or implied, of the fee conferred by the deed it remains vested in the son.

I am the more easily induced to reach this conclusion by the consideration that it avoids partial intestacy. For such would be the result of holding that the codicil had the effect of revoking the fee conferred by the deed so far as the sum falling to the son as a part of the forfeited share is concerned.

The fact that the codicil contains an express direction to pay over the £2000 at his death to the son's heirs and representatives whomsoever is not sufficient in my opinion to imply a revocation of the fee of any further sum happening to fall to him under the trust-deed.

It was not then known that any sum would so fall to him; and the testator appears therefore to have left such sum unencumbered by any direction except that it was to be retained so that the interest might be paid to him annually. This, therefore, I think, is a question which falls within the principle which we found applicable to the case of General Christie's Trustees, decided the other day [July 3, 1889, supra, p. 913].

In my view, therefore, no question arises concerning the disposal of the son's half of said residue. It is disposed of by being vested in the son. But if it had not been so vested, I should have had difficulty in avoiding the conclusion that it formed an intestate portion of the succession in which Mrs Mackenzie would have been entitled to share. The case of Gillies, 8 R. 505, to which we were referred, does not appear to me to be applicable.

I am for answering question 1 in the negative; question 3, that the second party is entitled to the fee subject to the directions contained in the codicil, and that the second part of the question should be answered in the affirmative; and by declaring the questions quoad ultra to be superseded.

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—Mrs Mackenzie claimed her legal rights, and repudiated the provisions made for her by her father's trust-disposition and settlement. I am clearly of opinion that by so doing she forfeited not only the provisions in favour of herself personally but also the provisions made for her heirs and successors. In coming to that result, I proceed entirely upon the deed itself, which, in my opinion, can be read as meaning nothing else. I do not proceed upon the case of Fisher v. Dixon, and the other cases cited to us, because I think that even if they were applicable they would not necessarily be conclusive the other way, while I think that the words of the deed are conclusive in favour of the view I have expressed.

No. 182.
Campbell's
Trustees v.
Campbell.

With respect to the one-half of the share of the estate set free by Mrs Mackenzie's repudiation, I have great doubts whether Lord Lee's construction is in accordance with a sound reading of the codicil. I think that the effect of the codicil is to restrict the interest of James Campbell to an alimentary liferent only. I do not think the deed can bear any other interpretation.

In that view, the next question is, what becomes of the fee of the sum which, in my opinion, is liferented by James Campbell—does it fall into residue, or is it intestate succession? On that question I desire to exercise my privilege of not expressing an opinion at all, as I do not think it necessary to do so, looking to the opinion which I understand both your Lordships to hold regarding the nature of the primary right.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I think it is quite plain that if Mrs Mackenzie repudiates the provisions made for her in the will, and claims her legal rights, she thereby forfeits all claims under her father's settlement, both as regards herself personally and also as regards her children. It is, I think, quite plain from the terms of the deed that by her repudiation the fee of her share is absolutely taken away not only from herself, but also from her heirs.

On the other question I have had much greater difficulty, but on the whole I have come to be of the same opinion as Lord Lee. I think if we read the will and the codicil together they do not import an intention to deprive the son, James, of the fee of the share coming to him through Mrs Mackenzie's repudiation of the provisions made for her. By the will the trustees were directed to pay over to James Campbell the sum of £2000, and the alteration in the codicil is to the effect that instead of paying over that sum they are to retain the capital and pay him the interest. There is a confusing direction at the end of the codicil, no doubt—"And at his death I appoint my trustees to pay and make over the said sum of £2000 sterling to his heirs and representatives whomsoever." But I do not think that that interferes with the direction in the will as to the disposal of the fee of Mrs Mackenzie's share in the event of her repudiation. There is no direction in the codicil except this, that if any sum should come to the son in consequence of the repudiation of the provisions by either of the daughters, the trustees are to retain that sum in their hands, and pay him the interest annually. There is no disposal of the fee, and as we decided a short time ago in the case of Christie's Trustees there may be a fee in a person, although the sum may remain in the hands of trustees who can only pay him over the interest annually. I take it that this case is ruled by that of Christie's Trustees.

The questions will be answered as Lord Lee has proposed.

ence to the third question, are of opinion that the second party is entitled to the fee of the half of the residue forfeited by Mrs Mackenzie, subject to the directions contained in the codicil of 5th July 1884; and that the first parties are bound to hold the other half of the residue so forfeited for behoof of the fourth party in liferent, and her heirs in fee: Find and declare accordingly, and quoad ultra, find it unnecessary to answer the other questions stated in the case: Find the parties to the case entitled to payment out of the trust-estate," &c.

JAMES SHIELLS, Pursuer (Reclaimer).—Shaw—Forsyth.
SCOTTISH ASSURANCE CORPORATION, LIMITED, Defenders (Respondents).—Jameson—W. Campbell.

Insurance—Horse—Policy—Condition—Personal bar.—A policy of insurance granted to the owner of a horse against its death from accident or from natural disease contained, inter alia, the condition—which was declared to be a condition precedent to the owner's right to recover—that in the event of the animal insured receiving any injury, the owner should have it attended at once by a qualified veterinary surgeon, and should forward his report to the insurance company, and that on the death of an insured animal notice should be sent to the company's office accompanied, or followed as speedily as possible, by the report of a qualified veterinary surgeon. It was further provided that notice to an agent of the company should not be sufficient compliance with the condition.

The horse having sustained a compound comminuted fracture of a fore leg, the owner, on the advice of a veterinary surgeon, who was not registered as such, had it killed at once, and by telegraph intimated to an agent of the company that the horse had broken its leg and had been condemned by a veterinary surgeon. This intimation was at once communicated by the agent to the manager of the company, by whom liability was at once repudiated. No report by a veterinary surgeon was forwarded to the company.

In an action against the insurance company held, after a proof (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner, dub. Lord Rutherford Clark), (1) that as it had been proved that the horse was fatally injured, and that in the circumstances the proper course was to kill it at once, the case was to be taken as one of death and not of injury in the sense of the above condition; (2) that although the notice had been sent to an agent of the company, as it had de facto reached the manager timeously, it was sufficient; (3) that the instant repudiation of liability by the company had rendered it unnecessary for the pursuer thereafter to send the report required by the condition, and barred the company from objecting to the want of it.

2D DIVISION.
Lord Trayner.
M.

ON 19th May 1888 James Shiells, Haddington, obtained from the Scottish Assurance Corporation, Limited, a policy of insurance on an entire horse belonging to him for £100, payable in the event of its death from accident or natural disease within the year following.

The policy bore that it was granted subject to the conditions on the back thereof, "which are to be taken as part thereof, and which, so far as they are to be performed and observed by the insured, shall be conditions precedent to his right to recover thereunder."

Among the conditions of the policy was the following:—" (Condit. 9. Immediately upon any animal or animals hereby insured becoming ill, or upon any indication of approaching illness, or upon their receiving any injury, the insured shall have the said animal or animals at once attended by a qualified veterinary surgeon, and shall forward to the company, addressed to their office at 119A George Street, Edinburgh, within twelve hours from such illness, ailment, or injury being brought to his knowledge, full particulars of the same, accompanied by the written report of the veterinary surgeon attending. In the event of the death of any animal or animals hereby insured, notice thereof in writing shall be sent to the office of the company as before mentioned within twelve hours after said death occurs, accompanying such notice by a full report in writing from a qualified veterinary surgeon, or sending the said report as speedily thereafter as possible, and as soon as reasonably may be after such notice, the insured shall deliver to the company a claim for the loss or damage sustained, containing, as far as may be reasonably practicable, the particulars and the estimated amount thereof, and in support of such claim the insured shall give all such proofs and explanations as may be reasonably required, including the report and certificate of a qualified veterinary surgeon, together with, if required, a statutory declaration of the truth thereof, and in default thereof no claim in respect of such loss or damage shall be payable, unless such notice, claim, particulars, proofs, and explanations respectively shall have been given and produced, and such statutory declaration, if required, shall have been made. It shall not be a sufficient compliance with this condition if such notice, as aforesaid, shall be only given to an agent, inspector, or veterinary surgeon of the company.”

Shiells v.
Scottish Assurance Corporation,
Limited.

On the morning of 4th August 1888 the horse was found to have accidentally sustained a compound comminuted fracture of the metacarpal bone of one of its fore legs, and was shot almost immediately.

On the same day Shiells telegraphed to Luke, one of the agents in Edinburgh of the insurance corporation,—“Horse leg broken; condemned by Wishart & Bannatyne.” Luke replied on the next day,—“On getting home last night about ten o’clock I found your telegram . . . I at once went to the other side of the town to see the secretary, and he arranged that, as it was now too late to do anything, I should see the manager to-day, and ask him to meet him this afternoon and arrange immediately what is to be done. I have just left the manager, and he will wire you later what course they are to take, so that you may rely that there will be no delay or want of attention by the company. I am exceedingly sorry to hear what has happened to your horse ‘Roslin Chief,’ and hope you will write me full particulars of the accident, as I may not go out before Friday, but someone else will be out to look after the case.”

On the 6th the company telegraphed to Shiells,—“Telegram Luke received. Not liable broken leg. Veterinary coming to-day. If horse killed without written consent, company no liability.”

On the same day Wood, Shiell’s solicitor, wrote to the manager of the company,—“With reference to the loss and claim under this policy, if you require the claim to be made in a form prescribed by the company, be so good as furnish me with a copy; or if in sufficient form, as already made, kindly say so.”

The manager replied next day,—“In reply to your letter of yesterday, I beg to inform you that there is no claim whatever under the above proposal, in respect that the insured has violated the conditions of his policy, and rendered it entirely null and void. The corporation’s veterinary surgeon was sent to Mr Shiells yesterday, but was astonished to find the animal had been killed without either the sanction or knowledge of the company. Our policies do not cover broken legs, only death; and this is distinctly shewn in the proposal signed by Mr Shiells.”

Shiells then, after some further correspondence, brought an action against the insurance corporation for £100, the sum insured.

The defenders averred;—“On Monday 6th August the defenders caused their own veterinary surgeon to go to Haddington, to make the examination necessary for their information. On arriving there he learned (and it is the fact), that the animal had been slaughtered, and that its carcase had been skinned and buried by orders of the pursuer, early on the said Saturday, before the dispatch of the said telegram. By acting in this manner, the pursuer deprived the defenders of the opportunity, to which they were entitled under their contract, of ascertaining the true position of matters, and of considering as to what steps or treatment might be necessary. The defenders, however, believe and aver that the horse would not have died from the accident in question; that by proper treatment it would have recovered from the injury; and that in any case, there was no immediate necessity for killing it. The pursuer failed to perform and observe the conditions of the policy in, inter alia, the following particulars: First, he did not have the animal attended by a qualified, that is a licensed, veterinary surgeon; he did not, within twelve hours from the injury being brought to his knowledge, forward to the defenders, addressed to their office in Edinburgh, full particulars of the same, accompanied by the written report of the veterinary surgeon attending; he did not, within twelve hours after the death of the horse, send notice thereof in writing to the said office of the defenders, accompanying such notice by a full report in writing from a qualified veterinary surgeon, or sending the said report as speedily thereafter as possible—all as required by condition No. 9. The only intimation of the accident sent by the pursuer to the defenders is contained in the said telegram, and in a letter, dated 6th August, also addressed to Mr Luke, and which letter makes no reference to the fact that the pursuer had killed the horse and buried its carcase. The only veterinary report sent by the pursuer to the defenders is a certificate, dated 6th August 1888, by a gentleman who examined the horse on the morning of the accident, and who is not a licensed, and therefore not a qualified, veterinary surgeon. Second, the pursuer, by killing the horse without notice to the defenders, prevented them from having the horse attended and prescribed for by their own veterinary surgeon, as provided for by condition No. 12.* Third, the pursuer violated condition No. 8 by skinning and burying the carcase, instead of preserving it for the insurers. Fourth, by killing the horse as aforesaid, the pursuer altered and increased the risk under the policy, and was guilty of failure to take proper and reasonable care of the animal, in violation of conditions Nos. 3 and 7. . . . It is specially denied that the defenders' veterinary surgeon examined, or had any opportunity of examining, the carcase of the horse. All that was exhibited to him was the leg of a horse very much decomposed, which the pursuer stated to be the leg of the horse in question."

The defenders pleaded;—(2) The horse not having died from natural disease or accident within the meaning of the policy, et separatim, the horse having died from wilful injury, negligence, mismanagement, or wrongdoing on the part of the pursuer within the meaning of condition No. 2, the defenders are entitled to absolver, with expenses. (3) The pursuer having failed to perform and observe the conditions of the policy in the manner specified in the defences, is not entitled to recover thereunder from the defenders.

A proof was allowed. The facts as disclosed in the proof were as follows:—The horse in question was a stallion, two and a-half years old, No. 183. of high spirit. His weight was about 15 hundredweight. The pursuer on the morning of Saturday, 4th August 1888, found him lying in his stall with a fore leg broken. The pursuer at once sent for Mr Wishart, a partner of the firm of Wishart & Bannatyne, veterinary surgeons, Haddington, in whose premises the horse was stabled. Mr Wishart deponed that his partner, Mr Bannatyne, was licensed as a veterinary surgeon, but that he himself had no licence, but that he had had great experience, and was in constant practice. He further deponed,—“I found the animal lying on his side, with his head to the door, and his off fore leg broken. The animal was in a cold sweat, and must have been very warm at one time—much fevered. . . . I examined the horse carefully. (Q.) And was it in great agony? (A.) It was not suffering very much at the time, but it must have suffered a great deal, from the state of perspiration in which I found it. I formed the opinion that the proper course to take was just to have the animal destroyed. There was no prospect at all of the break being mended. It was a compound fracture of the metacarpal bone, and the bone was protruding through the skin. I was of opinion at the time that it was quite incurable, and I have remained of that opinion. There was a piece of the bone detached. In all cases, the mending of a fracture in a horse's leg is a matter of great difficulty, and the difficulty is greater where the animal is an entire horse, owing to its spirit. In the case of a compound fracture it is incurable, in my judgment. Being of opinion that the injury to the horse in question was fatal, I ordered it to be shot, to put it out of pain.” Mr Bannatyne deponed that between 10 and 11 o'clock on 4th August he examined the carcase,—“I examined the leg. I found a compound fracture of the metacarpal bone. The edge of the bone was protruding through the skin. The bone had been shattered. I found the parties engaged in skinning the horse. I got them to disjoint the leg at the knee, and also to skin the part over the fracture. It was on examining it then that I found the compound fracture. There was a piece of the bone detached. In the case of a horse suffering from a fracture of that description, the proper course would be to destroy the animal, in order to put it out of pain. I consider such a case incurable. I should not think it of any use to try and sling the horse and set the fractured bone.” Other veterinary surgeons gave their opinion that such an injury as that described in the case of a young stallion was incurable, and that the proper course was to destroy it.

* "(Condit. 12) The company . . . in the case of disease or accident, may send their own veterinary surgeon to attend upon and prescribe for the animal or animals hereby insured, and in such case the treatment and prescriptions of such veterinary surgeon shall be implicitly adopted, otherwise this policy shall become null and void, and the insured shall forfeit all benefit thereunder."

On 29th January 1889 the Lord Ordinary (Trayner) sustained the third plea in law for the defenders, and assolizied them.*

* “OPINION.—By the policy of insurance founded on in this action, it is provided that the conditions on the back thereof, which are to be taken as part of the policy, shall be, so far as they are to be performed and observed by the insured, conditions precedent to his right to recover thereunder. By article 9 of these conditions it is stipulated—(1) that upon the animal insured receiving any injury the insured shall have the animal at once attended by a qualified veterinary surgeon; (2) shall forward to the company, addressed to their office at 119A George Street, Edinburgh, within twelve hours from such injury being brought to his knowledge, full particulars of the same, accompanied by the written report of the veterinary surgeon attending; (3) in the event of the death of the animal insured, shall send notice to the office of the company as before mentioned within twelve hours after said death occurs; and (4) that it shall not be a sufficient compliance with this condition if such notice as aforesaid shall be only given to an agent, inspector, or veterinary surgeon of the company.

“The pursuer failed to observe these conditions. He sent no notice whatever of the injury which his horse had sustained, or of its death, addressed to the

The pursuer reclaimed, and argued ;—The notice had been duly sent to the defenders in terms of the policy. It was no doubt addressed to one of their agents, but it reached the secretary on Saturday 4th August and the manager on Monday morning, and it could not in the ordinary course of post have reached the head office of the company before Monday. Then it was beyond dispute that the horse was so injured that it became the duty of the owner to have it killed at once. The case therefore was one regulated by the condition of the policy relating to death, and not those relating to injury ; and in the former case it was not essential to send a qualified surgeon's report with the notice ; it was enough if it was sent within a reasonable time afterwards. But to have sent it in the present case would have been a mere formality, for the company had at once intimated that they intended to dispute liability. In any event, Mr Wishart was a qualified veterinary surgeon in the sense of the policy.

Argued for the defenders ;—The policy made the report of a qualified veterinary surgeon essential, and no such report had here been sent. "Qualified" meant registered under the Act 44 and 45 Vict. cap. 62, which Mr Wishart, as was admitted, was not. Then, no notice had been sent to the company. Notice to an agent was by the express condition of the policy insufficient. Further, there had been no certificate of a qualified surgeon sent at any time. These were conditions precedent, the non-compliance with which barred recovery under the policy.<sup>1</sup>

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The facts of this case are few and simple. The pursuer's horse was insured with the defenders' company. It was found on the morning of Saturday, 4th August 1888, with its leg broken, and in such a state that in the opinion of all who saw it, and were, by knowledge, qualified to speak on such a point, although, perhaps, they may not have been "qualified" in the strictly technical and statutory sense, it ought to be killed at once.

The policy under which the horse was insured was a policy under which the defenders were liable only in the case of the death of the animal ; but the policy prescribed two distinct forms of procedure in different events, viz (first), in the case of the illness or injury of the animal, and (secondly) in the case of its death. Now, as regards the procedure to be observed in the first of these cases, I do not think it has any application to the present case. I think that the object of the procedure prescribed in the case of injury is that the company may have an opportunity of observing the progress of the case, and regulating its office of the company. The notice he did send to Mr Luke, the agent of the company, was not sufficient compliance with the conditions ; and even the notice to Mr Luke was not accompanied by the written report of the veterinary surgeon attending. Further, the horse was not attended by a qualified veterinary surgeon, for, in view of the terms of the Act 44 and 45 Vict. cap. 62, I cannot hold Mr Wishart (however experienced) to be 'qualified.'

"The conditions in question appear to me to be reasonable conditions for the protection of the defenders' company, and their observance on the part of the pursuer having been made by contract a condition precedent to his right to recover under the policy, it follows that his failure to observe the conditions deprives him of the right which by this action he seeks to enforce."

treatment, in order to protect themselves in the event of evil results following from an unsatisfactory mode of treatment. But in my opinion the present case was not a case of injury but of death. It was admitted at the discussion that the accident was of such a character that the death of the animal was inevitable, and that the proper—the only humane—course to pursue was to accelerate that inevitable end. The pursuer, under such a policy as this, if he adopts the alternative of putting the animal to death, undertakes the onus of shewing that death was inevitable in the circumstances. He undertakes that risk, and if he fails he loses his case. But if he succeeds in proving that the only result—sooner or later—of the injury would be the death of the animal, and that its immediate destruction is the only humane course to follow, then I think that we must take the case on the footing that the animal had been killed outright and not merely fatally injured.

No. 183.
Shiells v. Scottish Assurance Corporation, Limited.

Now, I think that no one can doubt that the pursuer has proved that the only proper course to follow was to put this animal to death. I think that is proved by the evidence of the pursuer's witnesses, who, whether they were "qualified" or not, were perfectly able to give advice and an opinion on such a matter. But if any doubt remained, it is settled, I think, by the evidence of one of the defender's own witnesses, Mr Gray, a qualified veterinary surgeon, who, when the question was put to him, "Do you think that any veterinary surgeon of experience would have expected that leg to mend," very candidly replied, "No, I don't think it." If, then, that was so perfectly obvious, the pursuer was justified in treating this as a case of incurable injury, and in putting the animal to death. The case so standing upon the facts, it follows that the pursuer, if he complied with the forms prescribed for giving notice in the case of death, is entitled to recover.

It is important to observe that from the first the defenders' company treat this as a case of death and not of injury. On the day of the accident the pursuer sends a telegram to Mr Luke, the agent of the company, with whom he had effected the insurance, in these terms:—"Horse leg broken: condemned by Wishart and Bannatyne." Luke replies to this next day, shewing what he had done on the receipt of the telegram,—“On getting home last night I found your telegram. . . . I at once went to the other side of the town to see the secretary, and he arranged that as it was now too late to do anything, I should see the manager to-day, and ask him to meet him this afternoon, and arrange immediately what is to be done. I have just left the manager, and he will wire you later what course they are to take, so that you may rely that there will be no delay or want of attention by the company.” So that the pursuer, on receiving this letter from Luke, gets intimation that his notice has reached the head office, and is in the knowledge of the secretary and the manager. Now, what do the company do on the receipt of this notice? They send off this telegram, dated the 6th August,—“Telegram Luke received. Not liable broken leg. Veterinary coming to-day. If horse killed without written consent, company no liability.” That telegram shews very plainly that they thought the horse must be killed, and they say they repudiate liability if it is killed without their authority. In my opinion, they were not within their right in taking up that position. It might not, indeed, be a breach of the law to keep the horse alive, notwithstanding the painful and incurable nature of its injuries, until the defenders sent their veterinary surgeon, but it certainly was a breach of the requirements of humanity. The importance of the telegram, however, is that it shews the view of the defenders themselves as to the nature, and the only possible result, of the injury. Then, on the same day, the 6th August, Mr Andrew Wood, solicitor, Haddington, writes, on behalf of the pursuer, to the defender's manager,—“With reference to the loss and claim under this policy, if you require the claim to be made in a form prescribed by the company, be so good as furnish me with a copy; or if in sufficient form, as already made, kindly say so.” The only reply to this was,—“In reply to your letter of yesterday, I beg to inform you that there is no claim whatever under the above proposal, in respect that the insured has violated the conditions of his policy, and rendered it entirely null and void. The corporation's veterinary surgeon was sent to Mr Shiells yesterday, but was astonished to find the animal had been killed without either the sanction or knowledge of the company. Our policies do not cover broken legs, only death; and this is distinctly shewn in the proposal signed by Mr Shiells.” So that the company at once took up the position that the pursuer's claim was bad, and that they were prepared to fight it.

Assurance

Now, what is the condition in the policy on which the defenders found? It is in these terms,—“In the event of the death of any animal or animals hereby insured, notice thereof in writing shall be sent to the office of the company as before mentioned within twelve hours after said death occurs, accompanying such notice by a full report in writing from a qualified veterinary surgeon, or sending the said report as speedily thereafter as possible, and as soon as reasonably may be after such notice, the insured shall deliver to the company a claim for the loss or damage sustained, containing as far as may be reasonably practicable, the particulars and the estimated amount thereof, and in support of such claim the insured shall give all such proofs and explanations as may be reasonably required, including the report and certificate of a qualified veterinary surgeon, together with, if required, a statutory declaration of the truth thereof, and in default thereof, no claim in respect of such loss or damage shall be payable, unless such notice, claim, particulars, proofs, and explanations respectively shall have been given and produced, and such statutory declaration, if required, shall have been made. It shall not be a sufficient compliance with this condition if such notice, as aforesaid, shall be only given to an agent, inspector, or veterinary surgeon of the company.”

The first question which arises under this condition is whether the pursuer is not barred from recovering because he has given no notice at all in terms of the condition, in respect that he sent the notice to Luke, the agent of the company, while the last clause of the condition expressly states that the giving of notice to an agent shall not be sufficient compliance with the condition. It is undoubtedly the case that the pursuer sent the notice only to Luke, the agent, and, in so doing, he took the risk of the notice not reaching the secretary of the company, but in point of fact the notice reached the secretary of the company that night, and was passed on to the manager on the following Monday. That being so, I think that there was sufficient compliance with the requirements of the condition regarding the giving of notice.

Then it is said that the notice was not accompanied by the report of a qualified veterinary surgeon. But the condition does not require the notice to be accompanied by such a report; the report may either accompany the notice or be sent within a reasonable time afterwards. But within the time when it would still have been open to the pursuer to send the report in terms of the condition, the company had intimated to him that they repudiated all liability under the policy, and so had put themselves in the position of making it unnecessary for the pursuer to send them any further notice or report. No. 183.

In these circumstances, I am of opinion that the defenders are liable. I think that the case is one of death, not of injury; I think that the company received due notice in terms of their policy; and I think lastly, that any objection which the company might have had to the irregularity of the proceedings after the giving of the notice is met by their own action in repudiating all liability. Shiells v.
Scottish
Corporation,

LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I am very glad indeed that your Lordship has been able to propose such a judgment as that indicated in your Lordship's opinion. I doubt whether I could myself have reached it. It rather appears to me that the effect of the judgment is to deprive the company of the benefit of conditions for which they have stipulated in the policy, but the conclusion at which your Lordship has arrived is in itself so fair and reasonable that I refrain from saying anything further against it.

LORD LEE.—I agree in thinking that the case as proved was from the first a case of death caused by the horse breaking its leg. It was found in the morning in such a condition that it had to be immediately destroyed. I think that this should be found as matter of fact. If this be the true view, no question arises as to fulfilment of the conditions applicable to mere illness or injury.

The only question is, whether the pursuer fulfilled the conditions, or failed to fulfil the conditions applicable in case of a death?

Here I think the defenders put themselves in the wrong. They knew that the telegram referred to the injury as fatal, or possibly fatal. For they answered,—“If horse killed without written consent, company no liability.” That was a plea in law which I think was good or bad according to the true view of the facts. If the injury was such as rendered necessary the immediate destruction of the horse, it was clearly bad.

In this view of the facts it was unnecessary to give two notices, first notice of injury, and a second of the killing. The notice given was in my opinion sufficient notice of death, and was so dealt with.

But it is said that the notice was not accompanied by a veterinary surgeon's report. The conditions here in question do not require that such report shall in all cases accompany the notice. They provide that it may be sent “as speedily thereafter as possible.” The pursuer by his agent wrote next day asking to be furnished with a form for making a claim, but the defenders answered this by telling him that there was no claim, and practically refusing to receive any claim or any report. After their manager's letter of 7th August it would have been absurd to send any report. The question was reduced to one of law, whether killing without the sanction of the company deprived the pursuer of all claim.

I think, as I have said already, that this question of law depended on a question of fact which the company refused to inquire into, but which has now been inquired into, viz., whether it was necessary to kill the animal, looking to the condition in which he was found.

Now, it was not disputed before us—it was conceded—that the pursuer had established the necessity of putting an end to the horse's sufferings.

The conditions of the policy are not so framed as to exclude a claim in such a case. The manager seems to have thought otherwise, but he was wrong, and

No. 183. his mistake has caused the whole difficulty. What the company were entitled to require, and ought to have given the pursuer an opportunity of furnishing, was, in addition to the notice of death, (1) a report by a qualified veterinary surgeon; (2) a claim with particulars; (3) such proofs and particulars as may reasonably be required, including the report and certificate of a qualified veterinary surgeon.

In the view I take of the case it is unnecessary to decide whether or not the expression "qualified veterinary surgeon" means the same thing as the expression used in some cases, "qualified and registered veterinary surgeon."

I desire to reserve my opinion on that question.

Lord Fraser.

IN September 1877 James Pettigrew, proprietor of the Rochsolloch Iron Works, Coatbridge, obtained a cash-credit for £5000 from the Clydesdale Banking Company. There were bound along with him in the cash-credit bond, but truly as co-cautioners inter se, John Hendrie, coalmaster, Edward Mather Bell, of the Coatbridge Tinsplate Company, and Job James Freeth, of the Caledonian Tube Company.

Pettigrew operated upon this cash-credit until October 1880, when the bank required a new cash-credit bond with another name or names in place of Hendrie's.

Accordingly on 25th October 1880 a new bond was executed, the cautioners thereto being (in addition to Bell and Freeth) William Hamilton & Company, shipbuilders, Port-Glasgow, as a company or firm, and William and John Hamilton, the individual partners of the firm.

By disposition, dated 11th February and recorded 24th March 1881, Pettigrew, "for certain good causes and considerations," assigned and disposed the Rochsolloch Iron Works and the ground on which they stood to William and John Hamilton.

In October 1887 Pettigrew became bankrupt and his estates were sequestrated.

The bank then called on the Hamiltons to pay the sum due by Pettigrew under the cash-credit bond, which they accordingly did. Having taken an assignation to the cash-credit bond, the Hamiltons brought an action of relief against Freeth and certain other persons who had guaranteed payment to the Hamiltons of Freeth's debt under the bond. At the date of the action Bell had died insolvent, and nothing could be recovered from his estates.

Hamilton &
Co. v. Freeth.

The pursuers averred that they agreed to be cautioners only on condition of obtaining the disposition above referred to, and that that was known and assented to by Freeth.

The defenders did not dispute their liability under the cash-credit bond, but they pleaded ;—(2) The pursuers having received from the principal debtor a security over his estate in relief of their obligations under the cash-credit bond, are bound to communicate the benefit of such security to their co-cautioners in all questions of relief against them. (3) The averments as to the agreement of the defenders to the special security being granted in favour of the pursuers are only provable by writ or oath.

The pursuers pleaded ;—(2) The pursuers are not bound to communicate the benefit of the disposition referred to, in respect the same was specially taken for the pursuers' security only ; et separatim, the defenders knew this at the time ; et separatim, the defenders agreed to this being done.

There was also a question, decided by the Lord Ordinary against the pursuers and not insisted in by them in the Inner-House, as to whether their firm and the two individual partners were three co-cautioners or only one.

A proof was allowed. The parole evidence was contradictory, but in the opinion of the Lord Ordinary, and of the majority of the Judges of the Second Division, it established that the Hamiltons had become parties to the cash-credit bond only on condition of obtaining a disposition to the Rochsolloch Iron Works as a separate security to themselves as a firm and as individuals ; and that Freeth knew of and agreed to this condition.

On 18th January 1889 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) pronounced this interlocutor :—“ Finds that the disposition of the Rochsolloch Iron Works, granted to the pursuers, was a security for their own behoof, and that they are not bound to communicate the benefit thereof to the defenders until their own claim is satisfied : Finds that, in settling the liability of the cautioners, the defender Freeth and his guarantors are only bound in one-fourth ; and, with these findings, appoints the pursuers, within eight days, to lodge a state in process, bringing out arithmetical results as to the liabilities of the parties, and reserves all questions of expenses.” *

* “OPINION.—James Pettigrew, an iron and coalmaster at Coatbridge, obtained a cash-credit with the Clydesdale Banking Company in the year 1877. There were along with him in the cash-credit bond (bound as full debtors and co-obligants, although only co-cautioners) three other persons, viz., John Hendrie, coalmaster, Edward Mather Bell, of the Coatbridge Tinplate Company, and Job James Freeth, of the Caledonian Tube Company, Coatbridge. Pettigrew operated upon this cash-credit from 1877 down to October 1880, when one of the co-obligants, viz., John Hendrie, having become somewhat embarrassed in his circumstances, the bank insisted upon another cash-credit bond being executed, with another name or names in room of Hendrie.

“Such a bond was executed on the 18th, 20th, and 25th of October by Pettigrew, the co-obligants being Edward Mather Bell and Job James Freeth, two of the parties to the first bond, and the fresh names were the pursuers of the present action, William Hamilton & Company, shipbuilders, Port-Glasgow, and William and John Hamilton, the partners of that firm. Pettigrew proceeded to operate upon this new cash-credit, and continued to do so down to the date of his sequestration, in October 1887, at which time the whole sum for which the credit was granted, viz., £5000, had been drawn out, and there was besides a considerable sum for interest due to the bank. The co-obligant Bell died insolvent, and nothing can be got in the shape of a contribution from his estate. The only two solvent persons to the bond of 1880 were the pursuers and Freeth. The bank demanded payment from the pursuers; and, on the 26th of October 1887, they paid, as the sum due to the bank under the cash-credit bond, £5201, 10s. 9d., and took an assignation of the bond from the bank, with all rights of diligence against the co-obligants.

"Freeth, upon being applied to for payment of his share, was unable to meet the demand; but he got certain of his friends (the other defenders in the action) to grant a guarantee in the following terms:—'Jointly and severally, we hereby guarantee to pay to you the proportion payable by Job James Freeth, of the Caledonian Tube Works, Coatbridge, of the sums, principal, and interest paid by you on 26th October 1887, videlicet, £5201, 10s. 9d., under the cash-credit bond granted by the Rochsolloch Iron Company, Coatbridge, James Pettigrew, William Hamilton & Company, William Hamilton, John Hamilton, Edward Mather Bell, and Job James Freeth, in favour of the Clydesdale Bank, Limited, dated 18th, 20th, and 25th October 1880, for £5000 and interest; including in this guarantee interest on Mr Freeth's proportion of said sums from the above-named date until the same is repaid to you, at bank overdraft rate.' This action is now brought against Freeth and the guarantors, and certain questions have arisen as to the amount (for liability is not disputed) of the contribution which must be made by Freeth or on his behalf.

"The first question has relation to a demand made by the defenders, to the effect that the pursuers shall communicate to them the benefit of a disposition, which the pursuers obtained from Pettigrew, of property belonging to the latter. The property consisted of the Rochsolloch Iron Works, the business of which was carried on in the name of the Rochsolloch Iron Company, Coatbridge, of which Pettigrew was the sole partner. The disposition, which is absolute in its terms, is admitted to have been a security. By this deed, dated the 11th of February 1881, Pettigrew, for 'certain good causes and considerations,' assigns and disposes to William and John Hamilton, both shipbuilders in Port-Glasgow, and their respective heirs and assignees whomsoever, heritably and irredeemably, All and Whole the Rochsolloch Iron Works, with all the steam-engines, boilers, rolling-mills, &c., in and upon the ground, and specified in an inventory. This disposition was duly recorded in the Division of the General Register of Sasines applicable to the county of Lanark, and the pursuers, William and John Hamilton, now stand invested with the apparent absolute ownership of the works.

"The defenders contend that any collateral security of that kind obtained by one cautioner cannot be appropriated for the covering of his own liability. It is certainly law, that where co-sureties are equally bound by the same deed, and one of them obtains a separate security or advantage from the principal, he is bound to communicate the benefit of it equally with them. For this doctrine there are several express decisions, which are noted in Bell's Principles (section 270), and the general rule cannot be disputed. But then this general rule must be taken with its qualifications. There is nothing wrong in a surety stipulating, before he undertakes the obligation of cautionry, that he shall obtain a collateral security so as to cover himself, and if he takes the proper precautions of making his co-sureties perfectly aware of what he is doing, and they acquiesce in it, then there can be no call upon the cautioner who has so obtained the separate security for his own behoof to communicate the benefit of it to his co-sureties. Professor Bell, in his Commentaries (1 Bell's Com. 349), makes the following observations:—'As to the cautioner who alone has stipulated for security, it is more difficult to determine whether he shall, to his own prejudice, be obliged to communicate the benefit of that security. A near relation, or confidential friend, may not think himself entitled to require security, while a stranger may be well justified in refusing to engage without it. And there seems to be no equity in obliging the latter to communicate the benefit of his precaution to one who would not himself have stipulated for it. At least, where such a difference has been openly made between cautioners, and with the knowledge of each other, it is probable that the Court would not communicate the security. But where, the cautioners being originally equal, one gets an advantage over the rest on the demand being likely to arise, or where the security to one is secret, the principle which rules the case is, that the co-cautioners are bound to act, or held to have acted, for the general benefit, so that what is given for the relief of one is to be communicated for the benefit of all.' Here Professor Bell deals with the case of an open, avowed obtaining of the security by one of the cautioners for his own behoof, and indicates his own opinion very plainly as to how it would be decided—which it does not seem to have hitherto been. Now this is the very case disclosed by the proof here. It is proved not merely that Pettigrew called upon the pursuers, beseeching and entreating them to become cautioners in room of the retiring Mr Hendrie—but also the defender Freeth did so. He denies this; but the Lord Ordinary does not believe him, nor does he believe the statements on this subject by Pettigrew, who seemed to give his evidence very much at random. Freeth repeatedly urged the Hamiltons to be cautioners, using as an argument the fact that they would get sufficient security in the Rochsolloch Iron Works, so as to protect them against loss; urging further that he, Freeth, had no security of his own, and did not want it, and could not demand it, because he and Pettigrew and Bell were all mixed up in bill accommodations. He was very much afraid that, if the Hamiltons did not come forward and give the additional name demanded by the bank, that he, Freeth, would be called upon to pay up, and this he could not do because all his capital was embarked in his works. Freeth never took up the notion that the disposition (the existence of which he professed not to know anything about until a recent period) was one in which he could claim any interest until this was put into his head by Pettigrew, just when Pettigrew's bankruptcy was impending. 'I became bankrupt,' says Pettigrew, 'about the middle of October 1887. I told Mr Freeth in May 1887 about my having granted the security over the iron-works, because I was trying at that time to carry through a cash-credit, which subsequently fell through. I was wanting Mr Freeth to become cautioner for me again. (Q.) And, as an inducement to him to do that, that he was secured on the other bond? (A.) No; I told him that if I could not obtain this credit I would have to collapse, and he said he had paid one cash-credit, and he could not pay this. I then told him that he was quite safe—that the works were secured to the cautioners. That appeared to be news to him—I knew it was, because I had never told him before. He was relieved a bit when I told him that.' Now, Freeth being saved, by the intervention of the Hamiltons, from being obliged, in the year 1880, to stop his works and pay up the cash-credit debt, which neither Pettigrew nor the other co-obligants with him could do, turns round and pleads the general rule of law against the carrying out of a fair bargain. Pettigrew untruly represents the Hamiltons as being very willing at once to become cautioners, whereas the real state of the case was that it was with the utmost reluctance they did so, and upon the distinct understanding and condition that they were to have, for themselves alone, the benefit of the security, so far as it would go in repaying any moneys they required to disburse as debtors under the bond.

"The second point in this case is as to whether, Bell being dead and bankrupt, there are here only two co-obligants or four. The obligation in the bond is very explicit. It runs as follows:—'We, the Rochsolloch Iron Company, Coatbridge, as a company or firm, and James Pettigrew, Cairnhill, by Airdrie, the sole partner of said firm, as such partner and as an individual; William Hamilton & Company, shipbuilders, Port-Glasgow, as a company or firm, and William Hamilton and John Hamilton, both shipbuilders there, the individual partners of said company or firm, as such partners and as individuals.' These are the LORD RUTHERFURD CLARK.—I need not resume the facts of the case. They are fully and clearly stated by the Lord Ordinary.

The first question is, what is the proportion for which each of the solvent cautioners is liable under the cash-credit bond? The Lord Ordinary has held that there are four cautioners, on the ground that the firm of Hamilton & Company is to be counted as one in addition to the partners. In this finding the pursuers acquiesce, and therefore we may take it as fixed that the liability of each cautioner is for a fourth of the entire debt.

The pursuers hold a security over certain heritable property which belonged to Pettigrew, the principal debtor. It is in the form of an absolute disposition in favour of William Hamilton and John Hamilton, the sole partners of Hamilton & Company. Though the disposition is absolute the pursuers admit that it is in security only. But this admission is under the qualification that it was granted to cover any liability which they might incur under the cash-credit bond. They further aver that they would not have become parties to the cash-credit bond unless they had obtained this security, and that Pettigrew and Freeth agreed that they should have it.

The pursuers have paid the whole debt due to the bank. They propose to apply the security to cover their share of it, and it is just sufficient for that purpose. At the same time they have raised this action to recover the share due by the defender Freeth, which has been guaranteed to them by the other defenders.

In answer the defenders maintain two propositions—first, that the pursuers are bound to communicate to them the benefit of their security, so that it shall be applied in the reduction of the total debt, with the effect that they shall be liable for no more than a fourth of the balance; and second, that at least it shall be applied only to cover the liability of William and John Hamilton, as individuals, to the exclusion of the company. In the latter view they claim that the balance of the security should be applied in equal portions to the reduction of the share due by Hamilton & Company and by Freeth.

I do not doubt the general doctrine that when co-cautioners are equally bound under the same deed, and when one of them obtains a separate security over the estate of the principal debtor, such cautioner is bound to communicate the benefit of the security equally to all. Nor did the pursuers dispute this proposition. Their case is that they are not within the rule, inasmuch as it was agreed between them on the one hand, and Pettigrew and the defender Freeth on the other, that they were to have the sole benefit of the security in so far as requisite to cover their liability.

The defenders have stated a plea that an agreement for such a special security can only be proved by writ or oath. If that plea was well founded they should have opposed any allowance of proof. But they did not do so, nor did they words which were made the subject of construction in the case of Macbride v. Clark, Grierson, & Co., &c. (24th November 1865, 4 Macph. 73), and the Lord Ordinary is unable to distinguish the two cases. The obligation of the firm was held to have had superadded to it the obligation of each of the partners, as individuals, and, such being the case, the defenders here can only be liable for one-fourth. The firm of William Hamilton & Company is one person, William Hamilton is another person, and John Hamilton is the third person; the defender Freeth making the fourth."

offer any argument in support of their plea. On the contrary, they admitted in the most precise terms that if in the opinion of the Court the agreement was proved by the oral evidence their case necessarily failed.

No. 184.
July 17, 1889.
Hamilton &
Co. v. Freeth.

In my opinion the defenders were quite right in making this admission. The parole evidence is not adduced for the purpose of contradicting or altering the conditions of any written document, but to prove a separate agreement which was acted on, and which was the condition of the pursuers becoming parties to the cash-credit bond. An agreement so made and so acted on can, in my opinion, be proved by parole.

The obligation to communicate the benefit of such a security does not arise from the deed by which the co-cautioners are bound, which does nothing more than fix the proportions of the debt for which they are respectively liable. It depends on an equity to which the Court in the absence of agreement to the contrary will give effect. But the rule cannot be applied so as to defeat a special agreement.

I do not pursue this topic. It is sufficient for me that the defenders did not maintain the plea to which I have referred, and, as I have said, I think that they were right in not offering any argument on it.

The question then comes to be, whether the agreement has been proved? In this inquiry it is material to observe that the cash-credit bond on which this action is founded was not the first to which Pettigrew and the defender Freeth were parties. There was a previous bond which the bank would have enforced owing to the embarrassed circumstances of one of the cautioners unless the present bond had been granted. In becoming parties to the new bond the pursuers were guaranteeing an already existing debt for which Freeth was liable. The form in which the bond is expressed debars them from taking benefit from this circumstance, nor indeed do they desire to do so. But they found on it as shewing that it was natural that they should stipulate for a special security, and that Freeth should be willing that they should have it. So far, it seems to me that they are right. The alleged agreement was, in the circumstances, a very natural and reasonable arrangement.

When I turn to the proof I cannot doubt that the agreement is established. The Lord Ordinary is clearly of that opinion, and I agree with him. I do not think it necessary to examine the proof. If the evidence of the pursuers is believed the case is clear. The Lord Ordinary has believed it, and has not believed the evidence of the defenders. On a mere question of credibility I should in any case have great hesitation in differing from him. In this case my opinion entirely coincides with his.

There remains the question whether under the agreement the benefit of the special security was limited to William and John Hamilton as individuals, and did not extend to their firm. Again I have no difficulty. I think that it is plain that the Hamiltons stipulated that they should have the benefit of the security to cover any liability which they might incur under the bond either through their firm or individually. Any other interpretation would defeat the evident purpose of the agreement.

LORD LEE.—I think that the questions raised in this case are attended with more difficulty than the Lord Ordinary appears to have felt, and I desire to explain the view upon which I am unable to reach the same conclusion.

1. The general rule of law is well stated by the Lord Ordinary,—“Where co-

No. 184. sureties are equally bound by the same deed, and one of them obtains a separate security or advantage from the principal, he is bound to communicate the benefit of it equally to them.”

July 17, 1889.
Hamilton &
Co. v. Freeth.

This rule is founded on principles of equity which are too obvious to need explanation, and it implies that no one who undertakes a suretyship jointly with others, and by a deed which binds them all in like terms, is entitled to obtain from the principal debtor, and therefore to the prejudice of his co-obligants' rights of relief, a collateral security for himself alone, unless he does so with the consent of his co-cautioners.

The opinion of Professor Bell, to which the Lord Ordinary refers, appears to me to be to this extent clear. His only hesitation appears to be as to the efficiency of an unequal arrangement though “openly made between cautioners.” Upon that point I see no reason to doubt that if the arrangement is clear, and is proved by competent evidence, it must receive effect. For there is nothing unlawful in an arrangement whereby one of the cautioners with the consent of all concerned shall receive a special security.

I must, however, give it as my opinion that the consent of the co-cautioners to an arrangement which is so greatly at variance with the ordinary obligations and rights of relief among cautioners cannot be proved by parole evidence. It is said that the plea on this subject was not maintained to the effect of excluding proof. But the interlocutor sheet shews that proof was only allowed after a discussion in the Procedure-roll, and before answer. And when I asked a question on the subject during the discussion, it was stated by counsel that the point was not given up, although it seemed to be thought unnecessary to argue it. Such proof was disallowed in the case of Macphersons v. Haggart, 9 R. 306, where the allegation was that a cautioner who had become bound by a separate obligation subsequently to the other cautioners had interposed for relief of two of the original cautioners alleged to have granted their obligation as matter of arrangement merely until the new cautioner should attain majority and undertake for himself. This decision proceeded on the view that the effect of the documents was to make them all co-cautioners, and on that assumption I think that the judgment stands on a clear principle. In the Outer-House I had taken a different view of the documents, and had allowed a proof, which was set aside.

I think that the question of evidence in this case arises much more directly. For the pursuers here did not come in by any separate obligation. They interposed by becoming parties to a new bond by which they along with the principal debtor and two of the parties to the old bond all bound themselves, conjunctly and severally, in like terms for the cash-credit. This bond makes no reference to any previous bond, or to any special agreement that the Hamiltons were to be in a different position from other co-cautioners.

The legal import and effect of the bond in this case was in my opinion to put all the parties, other than the principal debtors, in pari casu. Each has a claim of total relief against the principal debtor, and among themselves those who were truly cautioners have presumably the ordinary rights of relief and the ordinary duties of contribution—that is to say, each is liable in a question with his co-sureties only pro rata.

Such being the legal position of the cautioners towards each other, I think it incompetent to prove by parole evidence that one of them renounced or discharged his claims of relief in favour of another, and in the present case I think it incompetent to admit parole evidence to shew that the defender agreed that the security subsequently obtained by the Hamiltons under the ex facie absolute disposition should be granted to them for their own behoof alone to the exclusion of their co-cautioners.

No. 184.

July 17, 1889.
Hamilton &
Co. v. Freeth.

To allow such proof is to allow parole proof in contradiction of the obligations arising under the bond. For nothing in my opinion can be more inconsistent with the obligations incurred by co-cautioners towards each other, or more prejudicial to the defender's right of relief against the principal debtor, than to allow parole proof that the principal debtor granted with the defender's consent the ex facie absolute disposition of his property in favour of the pursuers and for their sole benefit.

2. The next question is, if the parole evidence is competent whether it is sufficient? I have examined it oftener than once, and I can only say that in my opinion it is unsatisfactory.

The Hamiltons appear to have been in partnership with the principal debtor in the Springhill Coal Company, and they must have known his position as well as anybody. If they stipulated for a security to themselves alone over the Rochsolloch Iron Works, and Mr Freeth agreed to this, nothing could have been simpler than to get a letter to this effect before signing the bond. In point of fact, the disposition was not granted for six months after the bond, and bears no reference to it. If their statement is correct that it had been stipulated for before the new bond of credit was granted, it would have been natural to expect that Freeth's written consent should have been asked to a conveyance whereby the principal debtor liable to him in relief divested himself of his whole property in the Rochsolloch Iron Works in favour of the Hamiltons. I cannot say that it is clearly proved that there was such a stipulation.

The fact that the pursuers did not examine the agents, or produce any of the correspondence which is said to have passed with relation to the disposition, is to me very strange. For I do not think that any intelligent and respectable agent who was informed that the deed was granted in fulfilment of a stipulation assented to by the other cautioners would have prepared the deed without making it clear that the co-cautioners were consenting parties and acknowledged the stipulation.

To hold the pursuers' allegation proved in the face of a denial both by the principal debtor and by the co-cautioners is in my opinion far from satisfactory.

3. Another question was raised as to the application of the surplus. The pursuers William and John Hamilton do not now maintain that there are less than four cautioners. In answer to a question they declined, through their counsel, to dispute the soundness of the Lord Ordinary's view. But they contend that they are entitled to apply the surplus towards extinction of the liabilities of their firm (the fourth cautioner), and to withhold it entirely from the defender.

My opinion is that there is no more difficulty in holding it proved that the security was stipulated for the benefit of the firm than there is in holding it proved to have been for their own benefit exclusively. If the stipulation is proved at all, I see no reason why it should not be sustained to this effect also.

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—I concur with Lord Rutherford Clark. I have no doubt that parole proof is competent on this question. This is a case in which a bargain was already made before the cash-credit bond was granted, and was a condition of the pursuers' granting it. It is a sound principle that where several persons become co-cautioners, and a security is afterwards granted by the debtor to one of them, the benefit of that security shall enure to all the co-cautioners, but I can see no principle which should prevent one of several co-cautioners stipulating, with the knowledge and assent of the others, that he should have the benefit of a separate security for his individual protection. I think that such a stipulation, if proved, is effectual. And I think that this is such a case if there ever was one, for I think it is proved that the Hamiltons entered into the cash-credit arrangement solely for the benefit of Freeth, to prevent him from having to pay under the original cash-credit bond. I do not think that the case of Macpherson decided anything to the contrary. It is not here proposed to contradict the terms of the cash-credit bond; in Macpherson's case parole evidence was disallowed, because it was proposed thereby to alter the conditions of the bond. This is just the exceptional case contemplated by Professor Bell in the passage quoted by the Lord Ordinary. I think that passage contains a sound statement of the law, and that parole evidence is competent to establish the special agreement to which Professor Bell refers. I further agree with Lord Rutherford Clark in thinking that the evidence clearly establishes the existence here of such an agreement.

Co. v. Freeth.

Sir Charles Pearson—Guthrie.

Superior and Vassal—Entry—Casualty—Composition—Relief—Implied entry—Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874 (37 and 38 Vict. c. 94), sec. 4.—In 1860 John Hamilton, a proprietor infest in certain lands, and entered with the superior, disposed them a me vel de me to his brother James D. Hamilton, his heir-presumptive, who took infestment but did not enter with the superior. On the passing of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, he was impliedly entered with the superior.

John Hamilton died in 1877, and James D. Hamilton died in 1886, without having been called upon by the superior to pay a casualty. He left a general disposition and settlement in favour of William Hamilton, who was infest thereon, and thus obtained an implied entry under the Conveyancing Act, 1874.

The superior then raised an action against William Hamilton, concluding for declarator "that in consequence of the death of John Hamilton, who died upon the 27th day of February 1877, and who was vassal last seised in" the lands, "a casualty, being one year's rent of the lands, has become due to" the superior. "and that the said casualty is still unpaid, and that the full rents" after the date of citation belonged to the superior till payment of the casualty.

The defender pleaded that the superior was not entitled to a casualty of composition in respect that the defender was heir-at-law of James D. Hamilton and also of John Hamilton.

Held by a majority of the whole Court (the Lord President, Lord Justice-Clerk, Lords Mure, Shand, Rutherford Clark, Wellwood, and Kyllachy) (1) that by James D. Hamilton's statutory entry a new investiture was created, and the prior investiture evacuated; (2) that on the death of John Hamilton a casualty of composition became payable to the superior which could have been exacted from James; and (3) that this casualty not having been paid by James a casualty of composition was payable by the defender.

Diss. Lords Young, Adam, Lee, M'Laren, Kinnear, and Trayner, who held No. 185. that the defender was only liable in a casualty of relief—

Lords Adam, Lee, M'Laren, and Kinnear holding that in determining the question of casualty the implied entries were to be disregarded, and that John Hamilton, on whose death a casualty became due, was to be regarded as the vassal last seised in the lands, and the defender as his successor, and that, accordingly, the defender being heir-at-law of John Hamilton was liable in a casualty of relief only—Lord Trayner holding (1) that by James D. Hamilton's statutory entry a new investiture was created, and the prior investiture evacuated; (2) that on the death of John Hamilton in 1877 a casualty became due to the superior, and could then have been exacted from James; (3) that non-payment of the casualty by James did not affect the defender's rights, and that the defender, as heir-at-law of James, the last entered vassal, was liable in relief-duty only.

Hamilton.

IN 1804 John Hamilton was proprietor of the lands of Rodgerton, Lanarkshire, under a destination in favour of himself and his heirs general. He was duly entered with the superior. He disposed the lands to James Hamilton by disposition dated 27th January 1804. James Hamilton was never infeft, but he disposed the lands to trustees with a direction to them to convey them to James Dunlop Hamilton, the second son of John Hamilton of Greenbank. The feudal fee, however, continued in the same investiture.

WHOLE COURT.
Lord Kinnear.
M.

John Hamilton of Rodgerton died in 1838. His eldest son and heir-at-law, John Hamilton of Greenbank, although he had no beneficial interest in the lands, completed his title to Rodgerton, and entered with the superior by precept of clare constat. He died in 1855, and his eldest son, John Hamilton, second of Greenbank, obtained a precept of clare constat from the superior, upon which he was infeft on 25th June 1855.

In 1860 John Hamilton, second of Greenbank, in implement of the disposition of his grandfather, John Hamilton of Rodgerton, and of the trust-disposition of James Hamilton, conveyed the lands to his immediate younger brother, James Dunlop Hamilton, by a disposition a me vel de me. James Dunlop Hamilton took infeftment, but was not entered with the superior till the passing of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, when he was impliedly entered. On 27th February 1877 John Hamilton, second of Greenbank, died without issue.

In 1886 James Dunlop Hamilton died, leaving a general disposition and settlement in favour of his brother and heir-at-law, William Dunlop Hamilton. He had never been called upon to pay a casualty. William Dunlop Hamilton was infeft upon this disposition, conform to a notarial instrument in his favour recorded in the Register of Sasines on 17th August 1886, and in virtue of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, was entered with the superior.

On 12th July 1887 the superior of the lands, Robert Edward Stuart Harrington Stuart of Torrance, raised an action of declarator and payment under the Conveyancing Act, 1874,* concluding for declarator

“When lands have been feued, whether before or after the commencement of this Act . . . (2) Every proprietor who is at the commencement of this Act or thereafter shall be duly infeft in the lands, shall be deemed and held to be as at the date of the registration of such infeftment in the appropriate Register of Sasines duly entered with the nearest superior whose estate of superiority in such lands would, according to the law existing prior to the commencement of this Act, have been not defeasible at the will of the proprietor so infeft, to the same effect as if such superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the existing law and practice . . . (3) Such implied entry shall not prejudice or affect the right or title of any superior to any casualties, feu-duties, or arrears of feu-duties, which may be due or exigible in respect of

No. 185. "that in consequence of the death of John Hamilton of Greenbank, Mearns, who died upon the 27th day of February 1877, and who was the vassal last vest and seised in" the lands, "a casualty, being one year's rent of the lands, has become due to" the pursuer as superior, "and that the said casualty is still unpaid, and that the full rents," &c., "of the said lands, after the date of citation hereon, do belong to the pursuer," until the said casualty and expenses should be paid. In the petitory conclusion the pursuer concluded for decree for £250, as the amount of one year's rents of the lands.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

The pursuer, after narrating the above deeds down to the infeftment of John Hamilton, second of Greenbank, upon the precept of clare constat in 1855, averred;—(Cond. 4) "Thereafter the said John Hamilton, second of Greenbank, as heritable proprietor feudally vested in the said lands, and in implement of the disposition referred to in article 2 [i.e. of John Hamilton of Rodgerton] in 1804, and of the trust-disposition and settlement of James Hamilton referred to in article 3 [i.e. of James Hamilton of Rodgerton], conveyed the said lands to the said James Dunlop Hamilton by a disposition, dated 8th, and recorded in said Particular Register of Sasines 9th August 1860. In virtue of this recorded title, and of the provisions of the Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, the said James Dunlop Hamilton had an implied entry in the said lands, subject to payment of the casualty of composition due by him to the superior as a singular successor of the said last mentioned John Hamilton, when it should become exigible on the death of the latter. The said casualty became exigible on the 27th day of February 1877, being the date of the death of the said John Hamilton, second of Greenbank." (Cond. 5) "The said James Dunlop Hamilton, without having made payment of the said casualty, died upon the 31st day of May 1886, leaving a general disposition and settlement in favour of William Dunlop Hamilton, his brother, the defender, dated 28th May, and which is recorded in the Books of Council and Session 8th June 1886. The defender is infeft in the lands described in the summons, conform to notarial instrument in his favour, recorded in the said division of the General Register of Sasines on 17th August 1886. In virtue of his said title, and of the provisions of the said Conveyancing (Scotland) Act, 1874, he is entered vassal with the pursuer in the said lands, and is liable in payment of the casualty which had become due as aforesaid."

The pursuer pleaded;—(2) The said lands being in non-entry, or a casualty of composition being due and payable therefor, the pursuer is entitled to decree of declarator and for payment as concluded for, in terms of the Act 37 and 38 Victoria, chapter 94.

the lands at or prior to the date of such entry, . . . but provided always that such implied entry shall not entitle any superior to demand any casualty sooner than he could by the law prior to this Act, or by the conditions of the feu-right have required the vassal to enter or to pay such casualty irrespective of his entering; (4) No lands shall after the commencement of this Act be deemed to be in non-entry, but a superior who would but for this Act be entitled to sue an action of declarator of non-entry against the successor of the vassal in the lands, whether by succession, bequest, gift, or conveyance, may raise in the Court of Session against such successor, whether he shall be infeft or not, an action of declarator, and for payment of any casualty exigible at the date of such action, and no implied entry shall be pleadable in defence against such action . . . and the summons in such action may be in or as nearly as may be in the form of schedule B hereto annexed."

The form of summons in schedule B concludes for declarator that "in consequence of the death of C [or otherwise as the case may be] who was the vassal last vest and seised in All and Whole the lands of X," a casualty has become due.

The defender stated that at the date of the disposition by John Hamilton, second of Greenbank, to James Dunlop Hamilton in 1860, and down to the death of the former in 1877, James Dunlop Hamilton was John Hamilton's heir-at-law, and that "the casualty payable by him was the casualty of relief exigible from him as John Hamilton's heir. The said James Dunlop Hamilton was always willing to make payment of the said casualty, which was never demanded from him by the pursuer." He further stated that he (defender) was "heir-at-law, both of John Hamilton, second of Greenbank, and of James Dunlop Hamilton, his brothers, and that the casualty exigible from him is the casualty of relief."

No. 185.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

The defender pleaded;—(1) The said James Dunlop Hamilton having been the heir-at-law of the said John Hamilton, second of Greenbank, at the date of the said disposition executed in 1860, and down to the death of the said John Hamilton in 1877, the casualty exigible by the pursuer from him, on the death of the said John Hamilton in 1877, was the casualty of relief. (2) The pursuer is not entitled to claim a casualty of composition from the defender in respect that the latter is the heir-at-law of the said James Dunlop Hamilton, and as such is liable only in the casualty of relief. (3) The pursuer is not entitled to claim a casualty of composition from the defender, in respect that the latter is the heir-at-law of the said James Dunlop Hamilton, and also of the said John Hamilton, and as such is liable only in the casualty of relief.

On 20th December 1887 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) sustained the defender's third plea in law, and assolizied him.*

* "OPINION.—The question in this case is whether the casualty which is admittedly payable to the pursuer is relief or composition.

"The defender's grandfather, John Hamilton of Rodgerton, was duly entered with the pursuer's predecessor as his immediate superior. On his death in 1838 his eldest son and heir-at-law, John Hamilton of Greenbank, completed his title and entered in his place by infeftment on a precept of clare constat. On his death in 1855 his eldest son, John Hamilton, the second of Greenbank, was entered in like manner by infeftment on a precept of clare constat. This second John Hamilton of Greenbank died on the 27th of February 1877. The casualty which the pursuer now seeks to enforce is that which became due upon his death; and the ground in fact, as set forth in the summons, is that he was the vassal last vest and seised in the estate. I think this is a correct statement of the true ground of action, because, although there have been two implied entries since that of John Hamilton, no casualty has been paid in respect of either; and, in terms of the statute, they are not pleadable in defence to this action. For the purpose of the present question, therefore, between the superior and the proprietor now infeft, John Hamilton, the second, must be considered as the last entered vassal.

"The defender, who is now entered by virtue of the Conveyancing Act, is the brother and heir-at-law of John Hamilton, the last vassal. But he is not entered in that character, but by virtue of a singular title derived from his grandfather, John Hamilton of Rodgerton. The grandfather had disposed the estate to James Hamilton, who was never infeft, but who disposed to trustees with directions to convey to James Dunlop Hamilton, the second son of John, the first of Greenbank. The trustees completed no feudal title, but John Hamilton, the second of Greenbank, having entered, as already explained, in 1855, he, in implement of his grandfather's disposition and of the trust-disposition, conveyed the estate to his younger brother, James Dunlop Hamilton, by a disposition which was recorded in the Register of Sasines on the 9th of August 1860. On the passing of the Conveyancing Act of 1874, the mid-superiority which was left in the elder brother John, the second, was extinguished, and James Dunlop Hamilton was entered with the superior by force of the statute.

"No casualty was paid or demanded during his life, and on his death in 1886,

No. 185. The pursuer reclaimed. On 31st May 1888 the Second Division, in respect of the importance of the question submitted for determination, appointed minutes of debate to be boxed to the Judges of the whole Court for their opinion.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

The pursuer argued in his minute of debate;—At the date of the passing of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, James Dunlop Hamilton, who had recorded his disposition from his brother John Hamilton, second of Greenbank, but had not entered with the pursuer or his predecessor as superior, was holding base of John. The effect of the Act was to extinguish he left a disposition and settlement in favour of the defender, who is now infeft, and who is heir-at-law both of John Hamilton, the last vassal duly entered under the old law, and of James Dunlop Hamilton, the last vassal entered by force of the statute.

"In this state of the title the defender maintains on the authority of Mackintosh v. Mackintosh, 13 R. 692, that the casualty exigible from him is not composition but relief; and I think his plea is well founded. It is said that the case of Mackintosh is inapplicable, because in 1860, when the title, confirmed by the Act of 1874, was completed, James Dunlop Hamilton could not have been entered as heir to John, because John was still in life. But the claim cannot be determined by reference to the state of rights in 1860, because at that time there was no casualty due. The lands were not in non-entry, and the action for casualties under the Act of 1874 is competent only when, but for the Act, the superior would have been in a position to sue an action of declarator of non-entry against his vassal's successor. If such an action had been brought in 1877 against James Dunlop Hamilton, he would have been entitled, upon the principle established in Mackintosh v. Mackintosh to say that he was in fact the heir of the last vassal, and therefore liable only for relief, notwithstanding that he had already completed a title as a singular successor. It is said that the decision applies only where the vassal is in a position to enter as heir, although he has chosen to complete his title as a singular successor. But this is not consistent with the judgment. Both in the case of M'Kenzie and of the Marys of Hastings it would have been impossible for the disponee, who was in fact the heir of the last investiture, to effect an entry in that character. The Lord President points out in explaining the case of M'Kenzie that, 'the form of entry was necessarily that applicable to a singular successor or disponee.' Nevertheless, the Court decided that he was entitled to the full benefit of his character as heir, and must be entered on payment of relief-duty only."

"This would not aid the defender if he also were not the heir of the former investiture. But he is in fact the heir-at-law of both his brothers, and the action is brought against him in accordance with the provisions of the statute, as the successor in the lands of the elder brother, who was the vassal last vest and seised in these lands, and whose death gives rise to the claim for a casualty."

"The fallacy of the pursuer's argument appears to me to lie in the assumption that a casualty becomes exigible in respect of every implied entry, and, therefore, that its amount must be determined in the same way as if the vassal had demanded a charter or writ of confirmation under the old law at the date of his infestment. It becomes exigible under the statute in respect of the lands being in non-entry, or more correctly, in respect of their being in the position which under the old law would have entitled the superior to a declarator of non-entry; and it arises against the person who is then the last vassal's successor in the lands, whether he is infeft or not. No implied entry is pleadable in defence, and therefore the intermediate entry of James Dunlop Hamilton creates no obstacle to the pursuer's demand against the defender for a casualty which became due in consequence of the death of the last entered vassal in 1877. But the amount of the casualty must depend upon the relation of the defender to this last vassal. If he is a singular successor only he must pay composition. If he in fact unites the characters of singular successor and heir, he is liable only for relief, whatever be the form of title upon which he is infeft."

John's mid-superiority, and to give James an implied entry with the superior. Matters so stood till 1877, when John died. On that event a casualty became due, and the pursuer as superior might have claimed it, but he did not do so. James died in 1886, and the defender had taken infestment under his disposition, and was now sued for the casualty which might have been demanded of James in 1877. The question was the same as it would have been with James in 1877, and the defender could be in no better position than James would have held then. Now, what was the position of James when by the force of the Act he became entered with the superior in 1874? John (i.e., John Hamilton, second of Greenbank), was still in life, and James was only his heir-presumptive. A disposition to an heir-presumptive was not a propulsion of the fee, and the implied entry created a new investiture cutting out John's issue.<sup>1</sup> The implied entry of 1874 evacuated the mid-superiority in John Hamilton, and on John's death in 1877, James could not have served heir to him, and connected himself with the old investiture, for there was nothing left in John's estate to which he could serve.<sup>2</sup> Thus James could not have resorted to the device of tendering himself for entry as heir on paying relief. If, then, the pursuer had brought his action in 1877 against James, James must have paid composition.

No. 185.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

The Lord Ordinary's view was, that if the defender united, as he did on John's death, the character of singular successor and that of heir, he was only liable in relief, and he assumed that, because an implied entry was not pleadable in defence to the action, the pursuer might not found on it as extinguishing the prior investiture. The Act of 1874, in introducing implied entries, made two equitable restrictions to prevent either party from unfairly pleading them, viz., (1) the implied entry was not to enable the superior on the one hand to demand a casualty sooner than he could have done under the old law, and (2) the implied entry was not to be pleadable by the vassal in defence to the superior's claim for a casualty. But there was nothing in the Act which otherwise limited the effect of the implied entry. James's implied entry entered him as a singular successor to John Hamilton, and he was not then John Hamilton's heir. On John's death, when he became his heir, there was nothing left in John's estate to which he could succeed, the mid-superiority having been extinguished by James's implied entry.

The cases established the pursuer's proposition that an implied entry was (subject to the two restrictions above mentioned) the same to all legal effects as an express entry by charter or writ of confirmation under the old law. That of Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley<sup>3</sup> was exactly in point. There as here the impliedly entered vassal had become the heir of the last vassal who paid a casualty. But there it was held that he could not fall back on the old investiture to the effect of paying only relief. It made no difference between the cases that, as the defender pointed out, the beneficial interest had there passed, not to the heir-at-law of the last vassal, but to another person. The question was to be decided by the investiture.<sup>4</sup> In the same case Lord Ormidale said that the right and title of the mid-superior were entirely gone, and that the defender there "could not tender himself or anyone else" as heir to such mid-superior.

No. 185. In Rossmore's Trustees,<sup>1</sup> the First Division came to the same conclusion on a question practically identical. In Lamont v. Rankin's Trustees<sup>2</sup> the same question was again decided. The only special feature in that case was that the defenders were testamentary trustees, who pleaded, but unsuccessfully, that, as they held the estate for the heir, the action could not be maintained against them. In that case the Law Lords had before them an opinion of Lord Curriehill in Sturrock v. Carruthers' Trustees<sup>3</sup> to the same effect. These cases shewed that the old device of tendering the heir was abolished. In order to claim the privilege of an heir, the vassal must be able to point to an investiture, subsisting at the time of his succession, in respect of which a casualty has been paid, and he must also shew that he is the heir under that investiture of the person who paid it.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

The Lord Ordinary relied on Mackintosh v. Mackintosh,<sup>4</sup> as shewing that the amount of a casualty must depend on the vassal's relationship to the person who last paid a casualty. But there there was no barren mid-superiority; the defender was at the time of his succession heir of the subsisting investiture, and could either serve as such or make up a title in form as a singular successor, and in these circumstances the Court held the form of the title to be merely accidental. What was truly laid down in that case was thus put by the Lord President,—"It is clearly established that the form of the title is not at all conclusive, and that an heir entering by a charter of confirmation or resignation may still have the benefit of his title as heir." Here there was a new investiture. The defender could not point to its ever having been enfranchised. He was therefore liable in composition in respect of his entry.

The defender argued in his minute of debate;—The casualty due was not composition but relief. The Lord Ordinary assumed that the question was the same as would have arisen if James Dunlop Hamilton had been sued for composition. The defender was willing so to take the case, but would first consider it on the footing of the summons itself. The summons placed it on the assumption that there had been no intermediate implied entry. It narrated that John Hamilton, second of Greenbank, was the vassal last vest and seised, and made no reference at all to the intermediate implied entry of James Dunlop Hamilton. That was the statutory form, and its true meaning was tested in Mounsey v. Palmer.<sup>5</sup>

Under the old law the question between relief and composition depended not on the form of the title, but on whether the person proposing to enter was or was not the heir of the previous vassal. That was the principle of many cases.<sup>6</sup> The 3d subsection of section 4 of the Act of 1874 provided that the implied entry was not "to prejudice or affect the right and title of any superior to any casualties . . . due or exigible in respect of the lands at or prior to the date of such entry." By this provision, intended only to preserve his rights as a superior, the pursuer was seeking to enlarge them. On the other hand, the 4th subsection provided that no implied entry should be a defence to the superior's action. The defender did not seek so to found on an implied entry. But he objected to the pursuer founding on one (James Dunlop Hamilton's) with the view of making him liable in composition. The standing investiture, which alone could be known to the superior, was that of the last vassal. But the last vassal was John, not James, and the defender was John's heir.

No. 185.
July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

The cases of Rankin and Rossmore's Trustees were inapplicable. In both the title of the defenders was a singular title in substance as well as in form, and in both they endeavoured unsuccessfully to put forward the heir for an entry. Here there was no such proposal. The defender, himself the heir, demanded to be dealt with by the superior in his true character as heir. Even, therefore, if James Dunlop Hamilton would have had to pay composition had the action been raised against him, the defender was only liable in relief, for, as to him, the one question was as to his relation to John Hamilton, the last entered vassal.

But the next question was whether the implied entry of James Dunlop Hamilton affected the liability of the defender. It was said that that implied entry made the case distinguishable from that of Mackintosh v. Mackintosh,<sup>1</sup> and assimilated it to Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley. But the alleged distinction from the case of Mackintosh made no difference, as the Lord Ordinary shewed. The principle of that decision did not apply only where the vassal was in a position to enter as heir although he had chosen to complete his title as a singular successor. In M'Kenzie's case<sup>2</sup> and in that of the Marquess of Hastings<sup>3</sup> the form of entry was necessarily that of a singular successor or donee.<sup>4</sup>

In Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley the beneficial interest had passed not to the heir-at-law but to a stranger to the destination, and the defender there was in fact as well as in form of title a true singular successor. In this case no stranger to the destination had ever had a beneficial interest in the estate. But in truth the question in this case and in that of Mackintosh was not really before the Court in Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley, as appeared from the fact that in none of the opinions were the cases of M'Kenzie or of the Marquess of Hastings mentioned. The sole question there was whether the defender could enter to a mid-superiority, and the Court held that his infestment had destroyed it, and that it was therefore a legal impossibility for him to take it up. The Judges did not consider whether the prior investiture was thereby affected.

If, therefore, the question had arisen under a claim made against James Dunlop Hamilton at any time between 1877 and his death in 1886, he would have been entitled to have escaped with payment of relief-duty. If so, it followed that the defender, the heir-at-law of James Dunlop Hamilton, and also the heir-at-law of John Hamilton, second of Greenbank, was not bound in any higher payment. If the question were taken as at 1877, then the defender was entitled to found upon the fact of his relation to James Dunlop Hamilton as his heir, and of James Dunlop Hamilton's relation as heir to John Hamilton, on the principle heres heredis est meus heres. If it were taken as at 1886, then at that date the defender was himself the heir of John Hamilton.

The following opinions were returned by the consulted Judges,—

No. 185. John Hamilton was owner of the dominium utile of the lands in question, which he held of the superior or his predecessor as his immediate lawful superior. In 1860 John Hamilton disposed to his brother James, with a double manner of holding, and James took infeftment but never was entered with the superior, and held base of his brother John down to the passing of the Statute of 1874. Between 1860 and 1874 therefore there were three estates in the lands—the pursuer's estate of superiority, John Hamilton's estate of mid-superiority, and James Hamilton's dominium utile. But after the passing of the statute there were but two estates—the pursuer's estate of superiority and James Hamilton's estate of dominium utile—and between the owners of these two estates there existed the direct relation of superior and vassal, John Hamilton's estate of mid-superiority being extinguished vi statuti. In these circumstances the pursuer as superior became entitled to a casualty (composition or relief) for the entry of a new vassal, but was precluded by a clause of the statute from demanding payment until the death of his last entered vassal, John Hamilton, the owner down to 1874 of the mid-superiority. James Hamilton, who had been the entered vassal of the pursuer in the dominium plenum since 1874, died in 1886, leaving a settlement of the lands in favour of his brother William Hamilton, the defender, who took infeftment, and thus became and is now the entered vassal of the pursuer.

The casualty which accrued to the superior in 1874 on the implied entry of James Hamilton has never been paid, nor has the defender paid any casualty in respect of his entry, and consequently a casualty is now demanded from him.

The only question is, whether the pursuer as superior is entitled to a composition or to relief-duty only.

As regards the facts, this case is admitted to be on all-fours with Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley, 4 Ret. 738. Mutatis nominibus, the facts are identical.

In that case Lord Curriehill found the defender, who corresponds to the present defender, William Hamilton, liable in a composition, and the Second Division by a majority adhered to his judgment. This judgment has been recognised as settling the law in several subsequent cases, and in particular in Lamont v. Rankin's Trustees, which was appealed to the House of Lords. The noble and learned Lords who advised the House, in affirming the judgment of this Court, reviewed all the cases on the subject, and determined, after the fullest consideration, that the rule adopted in one and all of them was sound law.

But I understand the Lord Ordinary and the Judges who agree with him to say, that in Ferrier's Trustees, as distinguished from the other cases which followed, the heir of the last vassal tendered for entry with the superior was the individual who had been impliedly entered under the statute, or, in other words, that he was at once proprietor of the dominium utile and heir of the deceased owner of the extinguished mid-superiority. This is quite true, but the fact was prominently in view of the Court in giving judgment, and the distinction was clearly stated by Lord Curriehill, who thought the case all the more important because if a person in the position of the defender were entitled to offer himself as heir, it would be very difficult to refuse to another vassal impliedly entered the right to offer the last vassal's heir for entry though the last vassal was a stranger to him. In like manner Lord Ormisdale, one of the Judges of the Second Division who affirmed Lord Curriehill's judgment, very pointedly states that "there is no longer any room or opportunity for the defender tendering himself or anyone else as heir to a mid-superior whose right and title are entirely gone." No. 185.

It seems to be thought that this distinction was not sufficiently pressed on the Court. But I am not prepared to disparage the authority of a careful and well-considered judgment on the ground that the case was imperfectly argued. July 18, 1889.
Stuart v. Hamilton.

I am therefore of opinion that we are bound to alter the Lord Ordinary's judgment on the authority of Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley.

But assuming the question to be open, I am of opinion that the pursuer is entitled to the composition for which he sues.

When the Act of 1874 came into operation, James Hamilton, who had previously held of his brother John as his immediate superior, was at that date converted into the vassal of the pursuer, and that immediately by the operation of the statute. The postponement of the term of payment of the casualty did not and could not keep alive the estate of mid-superiority in John Hamilton, which was immediately extinguished. James was no doubt heir-presumptive of his brother John, but he could take nothing in that character while John was in life; and on John's death in 1877 John had no estate in the lands in question to which James could succeed. He was heir so far as regards propinquity of blood, and he might have served heir in general to John, but there was no estate which he could take up by special service, and if he had asked the superior to enter him by precept of clare constat, he would have been met with the conclusive answer that he was already entered with the superior vi statuti, and could not be entered a second time, and in a different character.

The existing investiture prior to 1874 was created by an entry obtained by the defender's grandfather in favour of himself and his heirs general, and the estate thereafter passed through a series of heirs in terms of the destination, which was enfranchised by the superior when he entered the defender's grandfather. John Hamilton, who died in 1877, was the last heir who held under that investiture, for he had been deprived of the estate before his death by the operation of the statute, and nobody could take up the succession as heir to him, or (consequently) as heir of investiture. A new investiture therefore necessarily came into existence with the implied entry of James Hamilton in 1874 requiring to be enfranchised, which of course can only be done on payment of a composition.

The Lord Ordinary's judgment proceeds very much on the supposed application to the present case of the judgment of the First Division in the case of Mackintosh v. Mackintosh. But the principle of that judgment is in my opinion entirely inapplicable here. It was settled law before the Statute of 1874 that if the person entering with the superior was the heir of the existing investiture, he was entitled to be entered on payment of relief only, although he had made up his title to the estate in a form properly applicable to a singular successor. The form of his title was held not to deprive him of his character of heir. The same rule was in the case of Mackintosh held to be applicable in implied entries under the Statute 1874. But the important fact in that case was that the person impliedly entered was the heir of an existing investiture, and might have served heir in special under the investiture. Mr Æneas Mackintosh, the last entered vassal, made a mortis causa disposition of his estate in favour of his nephew Mr Keir, who was one of his two heirs-portioners. Mr Keir naturally made up his title by taking infestment on his uncle's conveyance, because one-half of the estate he could take only by virtue of the conveyance, and not as

No. 185. heir. But as regarded the other half pro indiviso, he held the character of heir of the vassal last entered, and heir of the existing investiture. He was, by taking infeftment on the conveyance, impliedly entered with the superior as disponee, but his character as heir entitled him, according to the judgment, to pay relief-duty only as regards one-half pro indiviso of the estate which his uncle left him. Nothing had occurred in that case to affect the position of the uncle as last entered vassal and as heir of investiture, and his right as such passed (quoad one-half pro indiviso) by the operation of the law of succession to the defender as his heir.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

The case of Mackintosh, for these reasons, appears to me to stand in clear contrast to the present, because it was attended by none of the difficulties arising from the operation of the Statute 1874.

LORD MURE.—I concur in the opinion of the Lord President.

LORD SHAND.—The question in this case being whether the pursuer is entitled to payment of composition, or is only entitled to relief-duty, it is essential to bear in mind the rule or principle which determines in the case of each entry with a superior whether the superior has right to the larger or only to the smaller payment.

That rule may be stated in this way—Where the entry, which before the Statute of 1874 was given by a deed under the superior's hand, was merely a recognition or renewal of the existing investiture, the vassal was only liable in payment of relief-duty; but where the superior was called upon to enfranchise a new investiture—that is to say, to grant a deed which not merely recognised and admitted the heir of the existing investiture, but admitted a singular successor—then the new vassal, as the condition of the enfranchisement of this new investiture, was liable to pay a composition of a year's rent of the subjects.

The Statute of 1874 did away with the necessity for writs or charters by progress, for by his infeftment an heir or purchaser of any property held under a superior was thereby declared to be duly entered with the superior, to the same effect as if the superior had granted a writ of confirmation. But that statute made no change on the rule of payment I have just stated. It is not maintained by anyone that if the entry of the vassal which results from his taking infeftment is an entry not under the investiture which the superior last sanctioned or renewed, but is a new investiture, the vassal can only be required to pay relief-duty. Composition in that case must be paid as the appropriate condition or price of the confirmation, or it may be of the creation of the new investiture. Even in the series of cases terminating with that of Lamont v. Rankin's Trustees in the House of Lords, 7 R. (H. L.) 10, no view to the contrary of what has now been stated was suggested. It was not maintained in these cases that if the vassals were unable to get behind the statutory entry with the superior resulting from infeftment they could resist the claim for composition, for the vassals entered were all singular successors. The struggle was entirely to get rid of the effect of the entry by bringing forward the heir of the vassal under the last investiture recognised by the superior, and so to make the payment to the superior that of relief-duty only. On that question, the decision of which has an important bearing on the argument in this case, it was held that, after an entry taken by infeftment constituting a new investiture, the vassal could no longer adopt the device or course of bringing forward the heir under the former

claim to composition and reduce it to a claim for relief.

The decision, then, of this case seems to me to depend entirely on this con- July 18, 1889.

of his infeftment, the enfranchisement or recognition by the superior of a new or different investiture from that which the superior last recognised, and in respect of which he obtained a payment? If it be, then according to the law, which has not been in any way affected by the Statute of 1874, composition is due. If, on the other hand, the entry is only that of an heir under the investiture last recognised by the deed of the superior, then relief-duty only is exigible.

The facts are very simple. The position in the title of three persons only requires to be considered.

1. John Hamilton (called second of Greenbank) was the last entered vassal in respect of whose entry a payment was made to the superior. He was never the owner of the property, but he had been put forward by the true owner, and had by agreement taken a place in the title in order to save the true owner a payment of composition,—as his father has also come forward on a previous occasion. This John Hamilton, as his father's heir, in February 1855 obtained a precept of clare constat from the superior on payment by the true owner of relief-duty, and he was infeft in June of that year.

2. John Hamilton in 1860 conveyed the property to his immediate younger brother James Dunlop Hamilton, who was infeft on the conveyance in August of that year. This deed was granted at the request of the true owners of the property, and in implement of certain deeds granted by them, which are narrated in the conveyance, and mentioned in articles 2 and 3 of the condescend-ence. James Dunlop Hamilton was heir-presumptive only, and of course not heir-apparent of his brother John Hamilton, the last entered vassal. On the passing of the Act of 1874, he became the entered vassal in virtue of his infeftment in 1860. John Hamilton survived till 1877, when the superior's claim to composition or relief-duty emerged, although payment has not been demanded or sought to be enforced till recently.

3. In the meantime James Dunlop Hamilton having died in May 1886, leaving a general disposition and settlement in favour of his immediate younger brother William Dunlop Hamilton, he in his turn took infeftment on that deed in August 1886, and so entered with the superior. He is not only the heir-at-law of James Dunlop Hamilton, from whom he derived the property, but it so happens that, as his brother John in 1877 also died without issue, he is heir-at-law also of John, the last entered vassal who paid for an entry.

These being the facts, the question recurs—Is the entry for which a payment is now demanded that of a successor under a singular title—has the superior impliedly recognised and enfranchised a new investiture, or, on the contrary, is the succession that of an heir of the vassal last entered who paid a casualty, and has the superior under the statute merely recognised or renewed the investiture existing when he received the last payment for entry?

The payment became exigible on the death of John Hamilton in 1877, but the demand was not made against James Dunlop Hamilton then, or during his survivance to 1886, and now his brother, the defender, is in the position of vassal infeft. The claim therefore is properly made against him as the proprietor in possession of the lands, and it is so made in respect of his own entry

No. 185. by the infestment he took. This is I think settled by the case of Mounsey v. Palmer, 12 R. 236. It is true that between 1877, when John Hamilton died, and 1886, when James Dunlop Hamilton died, the superior might have claimed a payment from the latter for his entry by infestment, followed by the Statute of 1874, but he omitted to make that claim, and the entry to be now paid for is that of the defender. The state of the facts was entirely similar in the case of Mounsey, in which the opinions were unanimous to the effect that though the superior might have made a claim, for a time, against an intermediate vassal who survived the vassal who had last paid a casualty, yet as another vassal had been entered in consequence of the infestment he had taken, the claim must be made against him, and as for his own entry.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

I have come to the conclusion, differing from the Lord Ordinary, that the defender is liable to the pursuer in payment of composition and not of relief only, for I think it is clear that the claim for a payment is made not in respect of an entry under the old investiture which the superior had recognised, obtained by an heir taking or entitled to take an entry under that investiture, but in respect of a new investiture which under the statute the superior must be taken as having recognised and confirmed.

The investiture on which the last casualty was paid was in favour of John Hamilton and his heirs, and if James Dunlop Hamilton, the intermediate vassal, had taken the property not by a de presenti conveyance in 1860, but by service to John Hamilton, or under his mortis causa deed in 1877 when he died—and the defender in his turn had taken the property as the heir of James Dunlop Hamilton—then there would have been a continuance of the old investiture, and the appropriate payment would have been relief-duty. But what occurred was quite different. James Dunlop Hamilton did not take as his brother's heir, and was not so entered when the Act of 1874 passed. He was then entered, but he was not then his brother's heir. This is clear, for his brother might have had issue after that date. He was an heir-presumptive only, not an heir-apparent, and the entry he obtained by virtue of the conveyance in his favour, granted in the circumstances already explained, was clearly an entry on a new investiture. From 1874 till 1877, during his brother's lifetime, he possessed the property as an entered vassal, not as his brother's heir to whom he had succeeded, because his brother was still alive, nor as his brother's heir to whom the succession under the existing investiture had merely been propelled, for he was not his brother's heir-apparent during that time. It is therefore, I think, not doubtful that if after John Hamilton's death in 1877 the superior had demanded a payment from James Dunlop Hamilton as for his entry, composition would have been due for the change of investiture. It would have been no good answer to the demand to say that John Hamilton having died without issue, it had turned out that James Dunlop Hamilton had on that event become his heir of line. The entry had been obtained in 1874. The investiture then was a new one, and the superior's right to a composition arose from the implied statutory confirmation of that investiture, although he was not entitled to demand payment of that composition sooner than the death of the last entered vassal. By the fact of entry the new investiture was established and confirmed, and the vassal who had been so entered for three years could not on his ancestor's death thereafter successfully seek to undo the entry he had got as a singular successor, and either in fact or in theory enter as an heir under the old investiture, on payment of a casualty only, as if he had taken the property as his brother's heir of line. Such a proposal or suggestion, if made, could not have been successful, for it would have been open to the same answer on the part of the superior as was made in the series of cases ending with that of Lamont, already referred to. In these cases, after the various defenders had been themselves entered under the statute as vassals, they proposed to put forward the heir under the former investiture as willing to enter, and so to revert to the old investiture—or at least do so in theory—and thus reduce the payment of composition to that of relief. It was held that this proposal was inconsistent with the entry which had been already taken in each case. So by clear analogy it follows that James Dunlop Hamilton on the death of his brother could not present himself as heir of his brother under the old investiture, because from 1874 to 1877 he had been in fact entered on a singular title and under a new investiture.

No. 185.

Stuart v.
Hamilton.

Then, is the defender in any different position? I think clearly not. He no doubt has taken the estate as the heir of his brother James Dunlop Hamilton, on whose death he succeeded, and if his brother had by a payment of composition, as on his entry, obtained an enfranchisement of the new investiture, then of course as an heir of that investiture the defender would have paid relief only for his own entry. In that case the superior would have received first a payment of composition, and now a payment of relief, in place of the single payment of composition to which I think he is now entitled. But the payment now demanded is the first that is asked since and in respect of the new investiture. The defender cannot plead his character of heir under the old investiture, because the title which his brother James Dunlop Hamilton and he have made up, and of which they have already under their infeftments obtained confirmation, precludes this. Indeed, if the view already stated be sound, neither the late James Dunlop Hamilton, nor anyone taking as his heir, could do otherwise under the new investiture after 1874, when it was confirmed by the statute, and so I am unable to see how the defender can now revert to the old investiture, and claim the benefit of a payment of relief only as an heir under it.

In one way, and in one way only, could the payment be reduced to relief, and that is by obliterating from the title as an element in the decision of this question the intermediate conveyance and infeftment in favour of James Dunlop Hamilton, and the superior's confirmation of these effected by the Statute of 1874. If this could be done, then it might be maintained that, looking only on the one hand to the person who was last entered and who paid for an entry, and on the other to the person who is now last entered, and from whom a payment is demanded, if the latter should happen to be the heir of line of the former, relief only shall be exigible, even although there have been one or more intermediate transmissions, with infeftments following on transactions of purchase and sale. I understand that if other arguments fail this view is contended for by the defender, who also pleads that the decision in the case of Mackintosh, 13 R. 692, enables him to maintain successfully that the mere fact of his entry under a title by conveyance will not preclude him from taking the benefit he can claim in his character of heir, and that the payment demanded will depend on his relationship and character of heir of line of the person who last paid a casualty.

Laying out of view for a moment the case of Mackintosh, the contention of the defender would, I think, lead to extraordinary and novel results in the law applicable to casualties—results which it would be most difficult to shew that the provisions of the statute have brought about. Take the very case in hand, and suppose that the entries of James Dunlop Hamilton and of the defender had taken place, as they did, not by virtue of the statute, but by charters of confirmation of the infeftments, I apprehend it to be too clear for argument that the pursuer must be entitled to a composition, and if only the confirmation had been asked by the defender of both infeftments at the same time he must have paid the composition. The superior's right would have arisen because of the new investiture confirmed. The only way in which that result could be avoided would have been by not so taking an entry at all. The authorities have now, however, firmly settled that if an entry with its benefits be obtained by infeftment taken, it must be accompanied by any disadvantages which attend it, such as the exclusion of the right to bring forward an heir under the former investiture, or (what is the same thing) a person already entered under a new and confirmed investiture seeking to set up his character of heir under the old and sopped investiture so as to reduce the payment of composition to relief.

The argument in favour of the contention that when the question of payment for an entry arises the intermediate entries between that of the person who last paid a casualty and the person against whom the demand is made shall all be disregarded is founded, I understand, on the provisions of the statute, sec. 4, subsec. (3), providing that "such implied entry shall not entitle any superior to demand any casualty sooner than he could by the law prior to this Act or by the conditions of the feu-right have required the vassal to enter or to pay such casualty irrespective of his entering," and subsec. (4) that "no implied entry shall be pleadable in defence" against an action of non-entry, and for payment of any casualty exigible at the date of such action. It is argued that the result of these enactments is not only that the superior can make no claim in respect of intermediate entries till the death of the person who last paid a casualty, but that however numerous these entries may be, and even of purchasers on singular title, yet if when the death of the vassal who last paid occurs his heir of line happens to have repurchased the property and become the last person infeft, relief only is due. The contention is said to be supported by the provision that "no implied entry shall be pleadable in defence," and the argument is said to derive some force from the provisions of subsec. (4) of sec. 3 of the statute as to the superior's remedy by action of non-entry, and for payment of a casualty, and the relative form of summons given in Appendix B of the statute.

What, then, is the meaning and effect of the provision that "no implied entry shall be pleadable in defence" against the action for non-entry and a casualty? Simply this—That the entered vassal when sued shall not be able to plead either his own or any intermediate entry as excluding the claim. He cannot say that he and the other intermediate vassals having been already entered no payment can thereafter be demanded. The clause is one to protect the superior, not to affect him injuriously. If it be said that as he so far obtains advantage by it, because the vassal cannot plead the implied entries, it follows that he cannot on the other hand found on the entries, the answer is,—the statute contains a limited enactment or provision, and there is no warrant for giving to it any effect beyond its clear terms. The words are, "No implied entry shall be pleadable in defence." But it is plain that the superior must be entitled to plead, and necessarily does plead, the defender's own entry where he has taken infeftment, for that entry is the very ground of the superior's claim to the payment of the casualty, which he can enforce by having recourse to the rents. Moreover, after all it does not appear to me that the superior does in any proper sense plead the implied intermediate entry or entries in such a case as this. When he makes his claim the defender answers the demand by saying he is heir of investiture of the last vassal who paid a casualty, but his own titles, which he cannot ignore, shew that the formerly existing investiture has been superseded. The heir under the old investiture cannot as such complete a title to the property. A service in special to the last person who paid a casualty could carry nothing, and could never complete a title, and a superior is entitled to require such a service by anyone claiming the character of an heir of investiture—Menzies' Lectures (3d ed.), p. 814, and authorities there cited. Again, if instead of intermediate entries the defender had taken infeftment on an assigned precept of sasine, and the progress disclosed a new investiture and singular title, in that case the superior without any intermediate entry could certainly demand a composition, because the infeftment confirmed carried out a new investiture.

No. 185.

Stuart v.
Hamilton.

I attach no importance to any argument founded on the form of the summons appended to the statute, and employed in this case. That form properly proceeds on the view that a casualty becomes payable on the death of the last entered vassal who paid a casualty. No one can suggest that "the death of C" in the schedule means the death of an intermediate vassal, although the expression used is, "who was the vassal last vest and seised." The form is quite suitable for the case—it is probably the common one—in which there are no intermediate entries. It might have been better to have added in brackets after the words, "who was the vassal last vest and seised in all and whole the lands of X," such words as ["where there have been intermediate entries, add, 'and who paid the last casualty'"]. But it is not surprising that the schedule should not have entered into the matter with such detail. It would indeed be a very strong proposition to maintain that because the person "C," who did pay the last casualty, is only described as the vassal last seised in the lands (which will be true in most cases), and is not also described as having paid the last casualty, as he did, that therefore the intermediate entries are not to be looked at even as links in the title, or for the purpose of ascertaining whether the vassal against whom the claim is made takes under the old investiture or under a new investiture and a singular title, on the confirmation of which a composition has never been paid to the superior.

The case of Mackintosh is clearly distinguishable from the present, and cannot, I think, affect the decision to be now given. In that case the defender had completed his title by taking infeftment, following on a testamentary settlement by his uncle. He was his uncle's heir-at-law as regarded one-half of the lands, and to that extent it was held he was only bound in payment of relief for his entry. But in that case there was no intermediate entry, or any change of the investiture, which had been already enfranchised when the defender's uncle had paid for his entry. The defender could have entered by special service and infeftment, and it was held in conformity with the former law that the mere form of the title he made up did not render him liable to more than the relief-duty payable by an heir of the existing investiture. The Lord Ordinary seems to indicate that the authority of the case goes beyond what has been now stated, for his Lordship observes,—“It is said that the decision applies only where the vassal is in a position to enter as heir, although he has chosen to complete as a singular successor. But this is not consistent with the judgment. Both in the case of M'Kenzie and of the Marquess of Hastings, it would have been impossible for the dispositive, who was in fact the heir of the last investiture, to effect an entry in that character. The Lord President points out, in explaining the case of M'Kenzie, that 'the form of entry was necessarily that applicable to a singular successor or dispositive. Nevertheless the Court decided that he was entitled to the full benefit of his character as heir, and must be entered on payment of relief-duty only.' But, as is pointed out in the argument for the pursuer, in both of the cases of M'Kenzie and the Marquess of Hastings, the defender was an heir of the existing investiture under entail destinations, which had already been enfranchised by the superior, a circumstance which was prominently before the Court in the case of Mackintosh. In M'Kenzie's case, M. voce Sup. & Vas. Apx. 2, p. 7, the interlocutor of the Court finds that the superior "is obliged to enter the defender, who in this case is the heir of the former investiture, in terms of the tailzie," upon relief and not composition, reserving the superior's claim to composition "on the entry of any future heir of tailzie not an heir of the investiture prior to the tailzie"; and in like manner in the case of Hastings, 21 D. 872, the interlocutor expressly proceeds on the basis of "the defender being the heir of the last investiture," and adds a reservation in the same terms as in M'Kenzie's case. These cases and that of Mackintosh therefore are in sharp contrast with the present. They were decided on the ground that the defender in each case was the heir of the last and still subsisting investiture, while in the present case the last investiture has been extinguished and a new investiture created and confirmed, the defender being the person liable for the composition payable in respect of this. The case is indeed in all its circumstances identical with that of the leading case of Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley, in which the defender was held liable in composition. It is true that the defence here maintained was not pleaded in that case, but if it had been well founded it is very difficult to suppose it would have escaped the observation not only of the bar but of the bench, by so many of whom the case has been considered and discussed.

I am on the whole of opinion that the judgment of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled, and that decree should be given against the defender for payment not of relief, but of composition.

LORD ADAM.—The question in this case is whether the defender William Dunlop Hamilton is liable to the pursuer in composition or relief in respect of his entry to the lands of Greenbank.

The material facts are few and simple. The pursuer and his predecessors were and are superiors of these lands.

John Hamilton was infeft in the dominium utile of these lands conform to instrument of sasine recorded on 25th of June 1855, proceeding on a precept of clare constat from the superior in favour of himself and his heirs.

John Hamilton was therefore duly entered with the superior. He died in 1877.

John Hamilton conveyed the lands to his immediate younger brother James Dunlop Hamilton, conform to disposition in his favour dated 8th and recorded 9th August 1860.

James Dunlop Hamilton died on 31st May 1886, leaving a general disposition and settlement, dated 28th May 1886, in favour of his brother the defender William Dunlop Hamilton. William Dunlop Hamilton is infeft in the lands conform to notarial instrument in his favour recorded in the Register of Sasines on 17th August 1886.

Such being the state of the titles, I do not think there can be any doubt that, prior to the passing of the Act of 1874, the defender William Dunlop Hamilton would have been liable in relief-duty only.

No. 185.
July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

The superior might, at any time after the death of John Hamilton in 1877, have brought a declarator of non-entry against James Hamilton during his life; but not having done so, his only course now would have been to have brought a declarator of non-entry against the defender, and he being admittedly the heir of the last entered vassal John, would have been liable in relief-duty, although possessing on a singular title, in conformity with the case of Mackintosh v. Mackintosh.

The main object of the provisions of the Act of 1874 now in question was undoubtedly to put an end to the creation of barren mid-superiorities, and it did so by declaring that every proprietor infeft in the dominium utile of lands should be held as duly entered with the over-superior.

On the passing of the Act of 1874 accordingly, James Dunlop Hamilton became immediately entered with the superior in virtue of the entry implied by the Act, with the result that John ceased thenceforward to be vassal in the lands, James becoming such vassal; and on James's death, the defender William became, in like manner, entered with the superior and vassal in the lands.

But while thus putting an end to barren mid-superiorities, I think the purpose of the Act was to interfere as little as might be, consistently with so doing, with the pecuniary rights and obligations of the superior and vassal, and I think that it has left them very much on the old footing.

Thus the third subsection of the fourth clause enacts that "All rights and remedies competent to the superior under the existing law and practice for recovering, securing, and making effectual such casualties, feu-duties, and arrears, . . . and all the obligations in the feu-rights prestable to or exigible by the superior, in so far as the same may not have ceased to be operative, in consequence of the provisions of this Act or otherwise, shall continue to be available to such superior in time coming."

Then after this general enactment as to the rights of the superior there follows the provision for the protection of the vassal—that an implied entry should not entitle a superior to demand a casualty sooner than he could by the law prior to the Act have required the vassal to enter, or to pay such casualty irrespective of his entering.

Then follows subsection 4, under which this action is more particularly brought, and which provides the only mode in which a superior's claims for casualties can be enforced—and therefore gives the measure of these rights, because if a right cannot be enforced it has practically no existence.

This subsection introduces a new form of action in place of a declarator of non-entry—a declarator of non-entry being obviously no longer applicable, because no lands could thereafter be in non-entry. But although the form of the new action of declarator and payment is different, the effect is the same as that of the former declarator of non-entry.

The only person who is entitled to insist in it is a superior "who but for the passing of this Act" would be entitled to sue a declarator of non-entry against the successor of the vassal in the lands—that is, the vassal whose death but for the passing of the Act would have caused the lands to be in non-entry. The only person against whom it can be raised is "such successor," and it is enacted that a decree for payment in such action should have the effect of and

No. 185. operate as a decree of declarator of non-entry, according to the "now existing" law.
July 18, 1889. Who, then, in this case, is the vassal in the lands, in the sense of this Act, Stuart v. and who is his successor?
Hamilton.

It is not disputed that John Hamilton is the "vassal in the lands" in the sense of the statute, and the action is brought against the defender, as his successor, on that footing.

But John Hamilton was not the vassal in the lands, except on the assumption that an implied entry is to have no effect in this question, because if it is to have effect, then James and not John would have been the "vassal" in the lands.

But if John is to be treated as vassal in the lands for the purposes of this case, then it is as his successor, and his successor only, that the action can be insisted in against the defender. But in calling the defender as successor of John, the Act does not mean merely that at some previous period John was proprietor of the lands, but that the defender is to be treated as John's immediate successor in title. If John is the vassal, and the defender is his successor, it is surely the terms of John's investiture which must be looked to to see in what relation his successor stands to him. If that be done, as the defender is admittedly the heir under John's investiture, he is liable in relief-duty only.

I confess that I cannot follow the reasoning by which it is proposed, in an action brought against the defender, as the successor to John, as "the vassal last vest and seised in the lands," to decern against him for a composition on the ground that he is not the successor of John in the lands because John had ceased to be vassal, and therefore could have no successor, but that he is the successor to James under a new investiture alleged to be created by James's implied entry.

It is quite true that as a matter of title James was John's successor and was duly entered, and that the defender is James's successor and is also duly entered, in virtue of their respective implied entries, but it appears to me that that has nothing to do with the present case, in which, for the purposes of the case, John is assumed by statute, contrary to the fact, to be the last entered vassal, and the action is, in the terms of the statute, brought against the defender as his successor.

It humbly appears to me that there are only two ways of looking at the case—either James's implied entry is to receive effect, or it is not. If it is, then John was not the vassal in the lands—he had thenceforth no connection with them, and could have no successor therein, and there can be no decerniture against the defender as his successor; or else the implied entry is not to receive effect, and in that case John is to be treated as vassal in the lands, and if so, then the investiture under which he held the lands must be looked to to see whether the defender is heir of the investiture or a singular successor. I cannot see that the superior is entitled to found on James's implied entry to the limited effect only of shewing that the defender is not John's successor, which he can only do by shewing at the same time, and for the same reason, that John was not the vassal last vest and seised in the lands. It appears to me that the statutory action proceeds on the footing and assumption that the vassal who last paid a casualty was the last entered vassal in the lands, and it further appears to me that the superior cannot plead or found on implied entries, because that would be to displace the foundation of his action. In short, in an action directed, and necessarily directed, against the defender as the successor of John, No. 185. I do not see how the pursuer can obtain a decree against him on the ground that he is not John's successor. I think, therefore, that the superior is precluded by the form and tenor of the statutory action from founding on inter-mediate implied entries. But, on the other hand, if the vassal were to be entitled to found on such entries, the effect would be to exclude the action. It was necessary, accordingly, to provide against that contingency; therefore the Act enacts "that no implied entry shall be pleadable in defence against such action," and that is all that was required to exclude any reference to implied entries on either side.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

Further, it appears to me that a consideration of the form of action given in schedule B, and which has been rightly adopted by the pursuer in this case, shews that the construction I have put upon the statute is the right one.

The summons seeks to have it found and declared that in consequence of the death of John Hamilton, who died upon the 27th February 1877, and who was the vassal last vest and seised in all and whole, &c., a casualty, being one year's rent of the lands, has become due to the pursuer as superior of the said lands, and that the said casualty is still unpaid, and that the full rents, mails, and duties of the said lands after the date of citation hereon do belong to the pursuer as superior thereof until the said casualty and expenses after mentioned be otherwise paid to the pursuer. Had the form in the schedule been strictly followed, the summons should have been thus expressed,—“A casualty, being one year's rent of the lands, became due to the pursuer, as superior of the said lands, upon 27th February 1877, being the date of the death of the said John Hamilton,” and so on as in the summons.

It will be observed that the summons proceeds upon the assumption, in conformity with the form in the schedule, that John was the vassal last vest and seised in the lands; but this he certainly was not, if James's implied entry is to be taken into consideration. Then the pursuer is directed to describe or refer to the lands, and if the casualty due is a taxed composition or an heir's relief-duty, to say that a casualty of £        has become due. Now, this surely is meant to refer to the investiture of the vassal last vest and seised before referred to, and not to any investiture under an implied entry, and then it is said that a casualty became due upon the        day of       , being the date of the death of the said vassal. All this appears to me to be framed in conformity with the provisions of subsection 4, and for the purpose of giving effect to them, and of leaving the superior's and vassal's rights and obligations, as regards casualties, just as they were before the statute.

If, then, John's investiture, as the vassal last vest and seised, is to be looked to, the question is whether the defender, as John's successor under that investiture, would “but for this Act” have been liable in relief-duty only. That would depend on whether he was heir under that investiture, notwithstanding that he held the lands under a singular title. That he is heir is not disputed, and therefore I think the case of Mackintosh v. Mackintosh directly applies.

I think the case is quite different from Rankin's Trustees v. Lamont, and that class of case. In these cases it was proposed by proprietors who were singular successors, but not also heirs under the investiture, to put forward the heir of the last entered vassal for entry with the superior, while here the defender is himself the heir of the last entered vassal; in the sense of the statute he is

No. 185. duly entered with the superior, and desires to put forward no one for entry with the superior.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

I think, however, that the facts of the case of Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley would have raised this question, but I am equally clear that the question was not raised or decided, probably because it occurred before the recent case of Mackintosh v. Mackintosh.

But it is said that a casualty became due in 1874 for the implied entry of James, that a new investiture necessarily came into existence with this implied entry, that this new investiture required to be enfranchised by payment of a composition, that the superior was precluded from demanding payment by a clause in the statute until the death of the last entered vassal, John, in 1877, but that he was now entitled to demand payment of it.

I do not, however, think that a casualty became due for the implied entry of James in 1874. The statute does not say so. But I suppose it is inferred from the fact that, as the law previously stood, if a vassal applied to the superior for a new investiture the superior was not bound to grant it, except upon payment of a casualty, even although the lands were not in non-entry. This, however, was an entirely optional proceeding on the part of the vassal, who chose to pay for a new investiture, and I do not think that it is to be necessarily inferred from it that a casualty is due for an implied entry.

As the law stood previous to the statute, lands became in non-entry, and a casualty became due, only on the death of the last entered vassal. The casualty became due because the lands were in non-entry, and was paid in order to obtain an entry. But no lands are now in non-entry, and if the whole matter had not been specially provided for by statute, I could quite understand a vassal successfully resisting a claim for a casualty, in respect of an implied entry, on the ground that his lands were not in non-entry, because he was duly entered by statute, and that he was not bound to pay the superior for an entry which he had obtained without his intervention.

The statute, as I have remarked, does not say that such a casualty is to become due. Neither does the statute say anything about payment of such a casualty being postponed. What the statute says is that the superior "should not be entitled to demand any casualty sooner than he could by the law prior to this Act." That is a different thing from merely postponing payment of a casualty already due. As the law previously stood, a casualty became due upon the death of the last entered vassal; but when the superior came to demand his casualty, the question then arose, whether the vassal was liable in composition or relief, and that depended on the state of the title at that time, and not at the date of the lands falling into non-entry. If, when the demand was made, the proprietor of the lands was in fact heir under the existing investiture, he was liable in relief only, although he might not have been the heir when the lands fell into non-entry; and so also, if a composition was payable, the amount would be calculated, not according to the rental of the lands at the date of the lands falling into non-entry, but at the date of the action.

I think, accordingly, that when the statute enacted that the superior should not be entitled to demand a casualty sooner than he could by the law prior to the Act, the intention was not to postpone payment merely of a casualty, but to leave the parties on the same footing as before the Act when a demand for a casualty was made.

Suppose the superior had raised after the death of John an action of declar-tor and payment against James for payment of a casualty, it must have been directed against him as successor to John. But James undoubtedly at that time—John having died without children—would have been the heir under John's investiture, and so liable in relief-duty only. If John had left children James would not have been heir, and would have paid composition, just as he would have done before the Act. I do not think that it was the intention of the statute, that when a vassal conveyed the lands to an heir-presumptive, a new investiture should be created. It remained to be seen when the demand for a casualty was made, whether that was so or not. If it then appeared that the vassal was heir under the old investiture, no new investiture was created.

No. 185.
July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

As I understand the matter, a new investiture, such as a superior could refuse to enfranchise except on payment of a composition, implies the introduction of stranger substitutes, who as heirs under the investiture would be liable in relief-duty only, and whose introduction therefore into the investiture would possibly prejudice the superior's rights by depriving him of composition.

Such a question arose in the case of the Marquess of Hastings, 21 D. 871, and might arise under an implied entry, and might entitle the superior to a composition, although the heir was also the heir under the old investiture; but no such case arises here.

I may say, although the case has not been so treated, that the only claim made on record in this case is for a casualty in respect of the entry of James, but which was not demanded during his life. The defender is clearly not liable for it, and I think that on that ground he ought to be assolizied.

If that casualty had been paid by James, the defender would admittedly have been liable only in relief.

In the pursuer's view of the case, that casualty was not only due, but became payable by James at any time after 1877. I do not see why the defender should now be held liable in composition because of the pursuer's negligence in failing to enforce payment of it.

It appears to be making the casualty payable by a vassal to depend not on the state of the title, but on an extrinsic fact, viz., whether a particular payment was or was not made, of which the vassal may have no means of knowledge. This appears to me to be without precedent, and contrary to principle.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is unnecessary that I should recapitulate the facts on which this interesting question of property law arises. The subjects passed by title to three brothers successively, John, James, and William Hamilton. John is the person by whom a casualty was last paid to the superior. A casualty is admittedly due to the superior by William, and the entry is untaxed. The question is, whether William is to be treated as a person who has entered as the heir of one of his brothers, or whether he is to be treated as a singular successor or purchaser, and therefore liable in payment of a sum equal to a year's rent of the subjects.

1. There appears to be a preliminary question which is raised by the minutes of debate, and is considered in some of the opinions of my colleagues. I mean the question, Who is the "predecessor" or person in consequence of whose death this claim of casualty arises? John conveyed the subjects to James by deed inter vivos, and thereafter died survived by James. If the superior had

No. 185.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

As I understand the matter, a new investiture, such as a superior could refuse to enfranchise except on payment of a composition, implies the introduction of stranger substitutes, who as heirs under the investiture would be liable in relief-duty only, and whose introduction therefore into the investiture would possibly prejudice the superior's rights by depriving him of composition.

Such a question arose in the case of the Marquess of Hastings, 21 D. 871, and might arise under an implied entry, and might entitle the superior to a composition, although the heir was also the heir under the old investiture; but no such case arises here.

The defender is clearly not liable for it, and I think that on that ground he ought to be assoilzied.

If that casualty had been paid by James, the defender would admittedly have been liable only in relief.

In the pursuer's view of the case, that casualty was not only due, but became payable by James at any time after 1877. I do not see why the defender should now be held liable in composition because of the pursuer's negligence in failing to enforce payment of it.

It appears to be making the casualty payable by a vassal to depend not on the state of the title, but on an extrinsic fact, viz., whether a particular payment was or was not made, of which the vassal may have no means of knowledge. This appears to me to be without precedent, and contrary to principle.

On the whole matter, I am of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be adhered to.

LORD M'LAREN.—It is unnecessary that I should recapitulate the facts on which this interesting question of property law arises. The subjects passed by title to three brothers successively, John, James, and William Hamilton. John is the person by whom a casualty was last paid to the superior. A casualty is admittedly due to the superior by William, and the entry is untaxed. The question is, whether William is to be treated as a person who has entered as the heir of one of his brothers, or whether he is to be treated as a singular successor or purchaser, and therefore liable in payment of a sum equal to a year's rent of the subjects.

1. There appears to be a preliminary question which is raised by the minutes of debate, and is considered in some of the opinions of my colleagues. I mean the question, Who is the "predecessor" or person in consequence of whose death this claim of casualty arises? John conveyed the subjects to James by deed inter vivos, and thereafter died survived by James. If the superior had

No. 185. been attending to his rights, he would have obtained a casualty from James as successor to John, John being the "predecessor" in the sense explained. Then
July 18, 1889. on the death of James survived by William, the superior would be in a position
Stuart v. to claim a second casualty, in consequence of the death of William's immediate Hamilton. predecessor James. That casualty would undoubtedly be the casualty exigible from an heir. In point of fact, the superior did not exact a casualty from James, and I find from the printed papers that Lord Trayner is of opinion that this omission makes no difference in the result. Lord Trayner points out that according to the conception of the statute (37 and 38 Vict. cap. 94), illustrated by the schedule, the claim to a casualty is always founded on the death of the last entered vassal, who in this case is James Hamilton. If this be the correct interpretation of the statute, then the superior's omission to exact a casualty from James would not have the effect of increasing the burden to William, who would of course be entitled to an entry as heir of James, which he is.

The Lord Ordinary, again, has held that the summons is rightly laid in concluding for a casualty as accruing in consequence of the death of John Hamilton, although his Lordship has not sustained the claim to the extent of the duty payable by an heir.

The result of my consideration of this question is that I agree with the Lord Ordinary in holding John to be the predecessor through whose death the lands are to be treated as if in non-entry. It is undoubtedly the general intent of the statutory enactments that the obligations of the vassal to the superior are to be as far as possible unchanged by the operation of the statute. The form of an entry with the superior is abolished, and the feudal relation is changed to a species of freehold tenure, in which every person is held to be entered by the mere act of taking seisin or real possession of the lands. But for the preservation of the superior's rights, the statute has introduced what may be termed a fictitious process of non-entry, in which it is set forth that a casualty has accrued to the superior in consequence of the death of someone, and that until such casualty be paid the rents and profits of the subject are to pertain to the superior. Under the feudal law, the person whose death caused the lands to fall into the state of non-entry was the last entered vassal; that is, the person who had last paid a casualty, and not necessarily the person who last died in the possession of the lands.

It might very well happen in the contingencies of life that an entered vassal would survive more than one of the successive disponees deriving right from him. But so long as the entered vassal survived, his mere existence was sufficient to maintain the feudal relation with the superior, notwithstanding that the vassal had parted with the substance of his interest in the lands. To what do these observations tend? That under the new process, as under the old, there must be one definite way of ascertaining who is the predecessor on whose death a casualty accrues; either he must be always in all cases the person who last paid the entry-duty, or he must be in all cases the person who last died infeft. The second alternative is plainly untenable, because the person who last paid the entry-duty may survive the person who last died infeft, and in such a case the superior's claim does not emerge. I therefore come to the conclusion that the new statutory action for recovery of a casualty follows strictly the analogy of the old action of non-entry, and that in this case the summons correctly libels that a casualty has become due in consequence of the death of John Hamilton of Greenbank.

I now pass to the main question, which in my apprehension is to be solved by the same criterion which I have proposed to apply to the question already considered.

No. 185.
July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

2. I conceive that for the purpose of enforcing the superior's pecuniary rights, and for no other purpose, the statute has authorised a form of action founded on a fictitious state of non-entry, in which the claim of casualty is to be made effectual in the same manner and to the same effect as if the lands were actually in non-entry. Such, I apprehend, is the true interpretation of these words,—“No implied entry shall be pleadable in defence against such action.” These words are clear and intelligible on the hypothesis that the lands are to be treated as if in non-entry (although not really so), for the purpose of explicating the superior's rights. The alternative construction is, That no implied entry shall be pleadable to the effect of limiting the casualties payable to the superior; but that an implied entry may be pleaded to the effect of extending these claims. This seems to me to be a very forced construction; and it is also open to objection on the ground that it supposes the Legislature to have contemplated a compulsory variation of the contract between superior and vassal. I think therefore that this construction is to be rejected. The hypothesis of the statutory action is that the defender is unentered (because the summons sets forth the death of C, “the vassal last vest and seised in all and whole the lands of X”), and while this hypothesis is contrary to the facts of the case, the defender is not allowed to contradict it. It was not necessary to say that the pursuer should not contradict it, because it is the pursuer's statement, and is indeed the condition of his claim, that the lands are to be treated as in non-entry. That being so, neither party is in a position to found on any implied entry, and the case is to be determined in all respects as if the defender was unentered. I do not conceive that the construction requires any aid from equitable consideration, but it is a construction that does not suffer from any equitable test that may be applied to it, because it gives the superior his due—that is, the sum which he is entitled to receive according to the original charter or feu-contract.

I would here interpose an observation which may possibly tend to remove one of the difficulties which have weighed with some of my colleagues—I mean the difficulty of getting over what is termed the new investiture of James when James Hamilton became entered by force of the statute. My observation on this is, that in strictness there are no longer any investitures, and therefore the distinction peculiar to our feudal law between a new investiture and a mere renewal of the investiture has no longer a place in our legal system. I think that in Scotland all property is now enfranchised or made freehold by the mere act of taking seisin or real possession, and that the statutory entry is not a thing substituted for investiture, but is its virtual abolition, under reservation of course of the superior's pecuniary rights.

In applying the principle I have indicated to the facts of the case, I have only to consider what would be the casualty due by William Hamilton in consequence of the death of John, supposing that the implied entry of the statute were non-existent. As the implied entry is not pleadable in an action of this nature, I think it must be treated as non-existent. In that case the lands are to be held as being in non-entry. Now, as William combines the characters of heir and singular successor, he is entitled to take the lands out of the hypothetical state of non-entry, just as he might have taken them out of actual non-entry, by payment of the relief-duties exigible from heirs. Indeed, the decisions

No. 185. go further, because, supposing an entry were to be taken, William would be entitled to be entered as a singular successor on the terms appropriate to heirs.
July 18, 1889. Under no circumstances, and in no state of the title, could a de facto heir be
Stuart v. required (according to the feudal law) to compound as a singular successor,
Hamilton. although in certain cases which are not hujus loci the superior might object to the introduction of a stranger into the destination unless composition was paid for or in respect of the insertion of his name. My opinion therefore is that although the defender was entered by the statute as a disponee of James Hamilton, who again was entered by the statute as a disponee of John, neither of these implied entries are to be regarded in this question, and so the defender is only liable for the casualty payable by an heir.

III. I conclude by stating in a word how I conceive the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor stands with reference to previous decisions. I have not been able to find any material distinction in the species facti between Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley and the present case. But as the present remit to the consulted Judges is made by the Division of the Court in which the case of Ferrier's Trustees was heard and determined, I suppose that their Lordships desire our independent opinions on the questions of law argued in the minutes of debate. The Conveyancing (Scotland) Act has opened a new chapter of property law, and after the lapse of fifteen years, during which a great number of points have come up for decision, it was perhaps considered desirable that the present question, which is one of general importance, should be considered by a Court differently constituted, and who would not be absolutely bound by the opinions, however weighty, of a numerically smaller body of Judges.

With regard to the series of cases, including Rossmore's Trustees, with which I have a long-standing acquaintance, and Lamont v. Rankin, which went to the House of Lords, I conceive that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor is not in conflict with them. These cases only settled this principle, that where the proposed limitation of the casualty to a duplicand feu-duty depended on the taking of an entry—that is, on doing something which could no longer be done—the defender must fail. In the present case, the defender is entitled, as I think, to the privilege of an heir irrespective of the form of the title in his person.

LORD KINNEAR.—I remain of the opinion to which I gave effect in the interlocutor under review, but the special point of the case is more clearly brought out in the opinion of Lord Adam, in which I concur.

I do not think that there can be any serious question as to the state of the feudal title. But in consequence of the Statute of 1874 the superior's right to casualties no longer depends upon the actual state of the title. The general purpose of the enactments which require consideration appears to be to abolish the necessity for the superior's intervention in order to complete the title of heirs and disponees, and at the same time to leave the pecuniary rights and liabilities of superior and vassal as far as possible untouched by the changes introduced into the system of conveyancing. In saying this, I of course accept as perfectly sound and authoritative the opinions which were expressed in the House of Lords in Lamont v. Rankin. It was there pointed out that the Legislature had expressed no intention such as had been assumed by the minority of the Judges “to leave payments to a superior exactly as they were, and not to give him in any case a title to a more valuable casualty than he would have had if the Act had not passed.” But the particular case, with reference to which it was held that no such intention had been expressed, was that of a singular successor, who, but for the Act, might have escaped composition by procuring the entry of the disponent's heir. On the general question Lord Blackburn says—"I agree that it was not the object of the Act to produce any change in the pecuniary relations between superior and vassal; and if I could see any reasonable construction of the language used by the Legislature which would avoid doing so, I should feel inclined to adopt that construction. But I do not think it would be justifiable to interpolate a scheme for this purpose not expressed by the Legislature." His Lordship therefore held that the heir of an extinguished mid-superiority could not be put forward to protect the actual proprietor of the lands. But although the Act contains no such scheme as was required to support the argument in Lamont v. Rankin, it does contain provisions for maintaining unchanged the pecuniary relations of the superior and his actual vassal, not by enabling the estate to be taken up by a person who has no right to it, but by fixing the conditions on which a claim for casualty may be made against the true proprietor. It is material therefore to inquire what the rights of the parties would have been if the Act had not passed.

No. 185.

Stuart v.
Hamilton.

The facts are simple. John Hamilton the second of Greenbank was the superior's vassal in the lands. But he had conveyed the dominium utile to his brother James Dunlop Hamilton, who was infeft in a subaltern fee as the vassal of John. James Dunlop Hamilton's subaltern right might be converted at any time by the superior's confirmation of his infeftment into a holding of and under the superior. But if the Act had not passed it is not probable that that step would ever have been taken. There was no reason for displacing John from the immediate fee during his lifetime; and when he died in 1877 his brother James was his heir-at-law, and in the ordinary course of things he would have completed his title in that character, entered with the superior as his brother John's heir, and thereafter consolidated the dominium utile with the mid-superiority. By completing his title in this way he would not have subjected himself to a claim for composition, but would have entered as heir for payment of relief-duty only, and when he died in 1886 the defender would have entered on the same condition as the heir of the investiture, because nothing would have happened to disturb the investiture created by the infeftment of John Hamilton of Rodgerton, the defender's grandfather. John Hamilton the first, John Hamilton the second, James Dunlop Hamilton, and the defender would, each in his turn, have entered as heir of that investiture.

The defender's position would have been just the same if James, as might have happened, had continued to possess on his subaltern infeftment after John's death, and had made up no title to the mid-superiority. The defender in that event, as heir of John, might have taken up the estate left in his hereditas jacens, taken infeftment on his special service, and so entered as heir.

It would have made no difference to the defender if James had applied for confirmation. He could not have compelled an entry in that manner without payment of composition during his brother John's life, because as he was only presumptive heir a conveyance to him was not a mere propelling of the succession. But, on the other hand, he could not have been compelled to enter until the death of John, or to enter at any time in any other character than that of heir. If he had completed his title on John's death by confirmation of his own infeftment he would not have been liable for composition, because he was in fact the heir of the last vassal, and might have entered in that character if he

No. 185. had thought fit. But whether he had been required to pay composition or not, and whether his confirmation had been obtained before or after the death of his brother, the defender would have been the heir of an enfranchised investiture, and would, when the succession opened, have been entered as such for relief. In whatever manner the title of James Dunlop Hamilton had been completed, therefore, the defender could never have been made liable for composition under the old law.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

The question therefore is, whether the statute gives the superior a right which the prior law would not have given him?

It cannot be disputed that immediately upon the passing of the Act James Dunlop Hamilton, as proprietor infest, was entered by force of its provisions with the pursuer as his immediate lawful superior; and as a necessary consequence of his entry the mid-superiority which had been left in the person of John Hamilton was extinguished. On John Hamilton's death therefore his heir, if he had left a nearer heir than James, could not have taken up his estate of mid-superiority so as to interpose a vassal between the superior and James or his successor in the dominium utile. This is decided in Lamont v. Rankin. It was equally impossible for James himself to take up the mid-superiority, because he was already entered in the full fee. This is decided in Ferrier v. Bayley. But the inference which it is proposed to draw from this admitted state of the title appears to me to be a mere assumption, altogether unsupported by any provision of the statute. It is assumed that because James Dunlop Hamilton was entered by the passing of the Act to the same effect as if the superior had confirmed his infestment, he therefore became liable, in consequence of his entry, for the same casualty which he would have required to pay under the former law if he had applied for confirmation during his brother John's lifetime. It is said that the right to enforce payment may have been postponed by the provision that the superior shall not demand a casualty sooner than he could by the former law have required a new vassal to enter, but the assumption is that nevertheless the liability attached immediately by the operation of the statute upon the title as it stood in 1874. But the statute creates no such liability as a consequence of the implied entry. It dispenses with the necessity for the superior's intervention in order to complete the title of an heir or a disponee by entry, and the abolition of the superior's right to enter heirs or disponees by his own writ or charter and not otherwise carries with it of necessity the abolition of his right to exact payment of relief-duty or composition as the condition of his granting an entry. His pecuniary rights are saved as far as possible by other provisions. But the Act gives him no right, either in express words or by implication, to exact a casualty in respect of every entry. If such a right had been conferred it would have given a most unreasonable advantage to the superior, because it would have given him right to a year's rent upon every transmission of the property, whether the lands were in non-entry or not. But the entry implied by the registration of a conveyance during the lifetime of an existing vassal does not of itself give right to a casualty, and there may be many such entries for which no casualty can ever be demanded. This appears to me to be the necessary consequence of the provisions for maintaining the pecuniary rights and liabilities of superior and vassal.

The provisions for this purpose are in subsections 3 and 4 of section 4. But subsection 3 has no application to the present case. That subsection provides that the "implied entry shall not prejudice or affect the right or title of any superior to any casualties, feu-duties, or arrears of feu-duties which may be due or exigible in respect of the lands at or prior to the date of such entry"; and it goes on to reserve to the superior all rights and remedies competent to him under the existing law for recovering such feu-duties or casualties subject to the proviso already mentioned. But there was no casualty due or exigible in respect of the lands at or prior to the date of James Dunlop Hamilton's entry, and the superior had no right or remedy for recovering casualties which could have been put in force at that date. This particular enactment therefore has no bearing on the case, and the rights of the parties to this action must be regulated by the fourth subsection, and not by the third. But the fourth subsection gives no right to any casualty except when the lands have come into the position in which but for the passing of the Act the superior would have been entitled to sue a declarator of non-entry. Now, it is certain that the superior would not have been entitled under the prior law to sue a declarator of non-entry so long as John Hamilton continued in life. The right to a casualty therefore did not accrue until John Hamilton's death, and accordingly I take it to be clear that if a change of ownership had taken place before John Hamilton died the only casualty exigible in consequence of his death would then have been payable by the new proprietor as his successor in the lands, and no casualty would ever have been exigible from anybody in respect of James Dunlop Hamilton's entry. There might indeed have been many changes of ownership between the entry of James and the death of John, and every new owner in succession might have been entered by implication of the statute, and yet none of them would have been liable for a casualty except the owner in right of the lands at the date of John's death. The statutory action could have been brought against him alone, and the intermediate proprietors would be in no way affected by the only remedy which the action affords. For the only remedy is to enter into possession, and draw the rents until the casualty is paid.

The importance of this consideration is, that when the right accrued, James Dunlop Hamilton was the heir-at-law of his brother John, and if he had been required, as he might have been, to pay a casualty as John's successor in the lands he would therefore have been liable for relief-duty only, and not for composition. This appears to me to follow from the well-settled rule of the former law that the casualty must be determined by the character of the applicant for entry, and not by the form of his title. There are many decisions to this effect. But that which appears to be most directly in point is the Marquess of Hastings v. Oswald, 21 D. 871, because, except for the implied entry, it is indistinguishable from the present. James Oswald held the lands of Auchencruive by an entailed title immediately of and under the Marquess of Hastings. In 1849 he disentailed with the consent of the three next heirs, none of whom was heir-apparent, and thereafter, in performance of the contract for disentail, he executed a new entail in favour of his nephew Alexander Oswald, as institute, and a series of heirs. This was not a mere propelling of the succession, because (as appears from the session papers) the lands were conveyed to Alexander Oswald, with entry as at the date of the conveyance in October 1849, and Alexander, being a nephew of the disponent, might of course have been excluded from the succession under the former investiture by the birth of an heir of the body. When the fee became vacant on the death of James Oswald in 1853 the superior maintained that Alexander Oswald held by a singular title, because his right stood upon a conveyance inter vivos executed in performance of a contract by

No. 185. the last vassal. But the Court held that he was entitled to entry by a charter of confirmation for the same payment as if he had entered by service as heir of the old investiture, because although his right to the lands stood upon a conveyance inter vivos he was in fact the heir of the vassal last vest and seised in the fee. The case was complicated with another question, because the subsequent destination under the new entail differed from that of the old entail, and it was accordingly found that "a reservation must be admitted into the charter of confirmation by which the new investiture is established reserving to the superior his right to claim a year's rent upon the entry of the first substitute who shall not be the then existing heir under the former investiture, and to the vassal any legal defence against such claim." This part of the judgment has a material bearing on the argument. But the point of importance at present is that the casualty was determined by the new vassal's personal character as heir of the old destination, and not by the title under which alone he could hold the lands. On the same reasoning James Dunlop Hamilton would have been entitled, if the Act of 1874 had not passed, to demand a confirmation of his existing infestment for payment of relief-duty, because although he held the lands upon a singular title he was in fact the heir of the last investiture. The only difference is that there would have been no occasion to make any reservation in the charter, because the confirmation after John's death of his conveyance to James, and of the infestment following upon it, would have made no change whatever in the investiture. It was a mere renewal of the old investiture, because no one could take up the estate in succession to James as his heir who was not also the heir of the old investiture.

The question then is, whether James Hamilton had lost the right to have the benefit of his confirmation for payment of relief by reason of his implied entry under the statute? I think he had not, because the statute subjects the successor of a deceased vassal to no other casualty than would have been exigible under the old law if such successor had been required to enter at the date when the right accrues. It is true that at that date James Hamilton could not have made up a title by special service as heir, because he had been already entered by the confirmation of his predecessor's conveyance; and it is equally true that under the former law the superior could not be compelled to enter his last vassal's successor in the character of heir unless his right were judicially ascertained by a special service. But the point is, that although the successor could not enter as heir by reason of the form of his title he was still entitled to the benefit of his character as heir, and might demand an entry by charter of resignation or charter of confirmation for payment of relief, and it was decided in Mackintosh v. Mackintosh that a successor who has been already entered by the implied confirmation of his ancestor's conveyance is still entitled to the same benefit if he be in fact the heir at the time when the right to casualty accrues. This decision appears to me to be directly applicable to the case of James Dunlop Hamilton. I agree that it would not be in point if the right to composition accrued at the date when the Act came into force in consequence of the implied confirmation of his infestment, or, in other words, if that implied entry were the sole ground of the pursuer's claim, but, for the reason already given, I think this is a false assumption. The right does not arise from the implied entry, but from the subsequent death of the last entered vassal. In this respect the case of Mackintosh v. Mackintosh resembles the present. The only effect of the implied entry in the one case, as in the other, is to prevent the new vassal from entering by special service. But that does not prevent him from saying that he is in fact the heir. The principle which I take to be recognised in the case of Mackintosh is, that the casualty payable by a successor already entered by force of the statute is to be fixed by the same rule ~~as if he were demanding a charter at the time when the action for casualty is raised.~~ No. 185.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v. Hamilton.

But, apart from that decision, I think the same conclusions follow from the conditions which the statute attaches to the superior's right of action. The case in which alone the action can be brought is when the superior would, "but for the Act, be entitled to sue a declarator of non-entry against the successor of the vassal in the lands"; and it is to be brought "against such successor whether he shall be infeft or not." It may be proper to observe that the Act seems to contemplate the possibility of a declarator of non-entry being sustained by reason of special stipulations in the feu-contract, because the prescribed form of summons contains alternatives by which it might be adapted to such cases if they occurred, and which are inapplicable to the normal case of non-entry by death. But the only case which it is necessary to consider for the present purpose is that of a feu-right conceived in the ordinary terms. And there can be no question as to the effect of the provision just cited in its application to such a right. It requires the superior to shew as the condition of his right of action, first, that the vassal last vest and seised in the lands has died, because that is the only event which could have brought the lands into non-entry; and secondly, that his successor, "whether by succession or by conveyance," still remains unentered, because that is the condition upon which under the former law he could have sued a declarator of non-entry. The prescribed form of summons is exactly in accordance with the substantive enactment, because it requires the pursuer to set forth that the casualty has become due "in consequence of the death of the vassal last vest and seised in the lands." Now, that is an assertion which could not be made if the implied entry were to be taken into account, because the vassal last vest and seised would in that case be either the defender in the action or any predecessor who had obtained such entry, and therefore, as a necessary complement of the provision which requires the superior to treat the vassal on whose death the right accrues as the last entered vassal, it is provided that "no implied entry shall be pleadable in defence against the action." The superior therefore is to bring his action on the assumption that no entry has taken place since that of the vassal whose death he alleges as the ground of his right, and the defender is forbidden to traverse that assumption by alleging an implied entry. But if the implied entry is to be disregarded for the purposes of the action, the liability for a casualty must be determined on the assumption that the last entered vassal's successor still requires to obtain an entry, or, in other words, he is to pay for the entry which the statute has given him on the same footing as if he were demanding a charter from the superior in answer to a declarator of non-entry. The question therefore must be whether, if he were not entered at the date of the action, he could have demanded a charter without paying composition as for a new investiture.

If the superior had brought such an action in 1877 it does not appear to me James Dunlop Hamilton's right to demand a charter without composition could have been disputed. The pursuer would have alleged, as he does now, that the casualty had become due in consequence of the death of John Hamilton, who was the last entered vassal. The answer would have been that the defender was heir of line of this last vassal, and had therefore right to obtain a charter confirming the titles on which he already held the lands for payment of relief, and the superior could not have maintained that the implied entry had excluded that right without admitting that he had been already entered, and so contradicting his own ground of action. It has been suggested that he might nevertheless found upon the title of the defender, who could not dispute his own title, and that that title would have disclosed a change of the investiture. That is just saying in other words that John Hamilton was not the last entered vassal, because there can be no change of investiture until a new charter has been obtained from the superior in favour of strangers to the old investiture. But the suggestion is fallacious, because it confuses between the title upon which the vassal may be supposed to have entered, or to have right to enter, and the entry itself. The pursuer's argument indeed appears to me to be vitiated throughout by this inaccurate use of the terms "entry" and "investiture." It is elementary, but it has not perhaps been sufficiently kept in view, that the entry of a vassal who has been infeft upon the precept of a prior vassal, and not directly upon the precept of the superior, means nothing but the superior's recognition of the infeftment. The investiture in like manner is the title and infeftment plus the recognition. It would not therefore have occurred to me to doubt that either party might found upon the vassal's title notwithstanding the prohibition against pleading the implied entry. It must be permissible to found upon the title for the purpose of ascertaining the successor in the lands, against whom alone the action lies. But what cannot be pleaded is not the title, but the recognition of the title, which would otherwise have been implied under subsection 2. In other words, the statute says that it shall not be maintained that the registration of a conveyance during the lifetime of an entered vassal has operated as a recognition of the dispositive by the superior or as a change of the investiture. It cannot, of course, have changed the investiture if it is not a recognition of the dispositive, because it is elementary and fundamental that an investiture once recognised cannot be displaced except by a return of the feu to the superior, or by the superior's recognition of a stranger.

If this action had been brought therefore in 1877 James Hamilton's title would have disclosed no change whatever in the investiture. It would have shewn only that James Hamilton, who was the heir of the investiture, had been already entered by a charter by progress, which, if it had not been implied by the statute, he would have been entitled to obtain for relief. The implied writ of confirmation would no doubt have altered the investiture if it had enabled James Hamilton's heirs to enter for relief, although they were not also the heirs of John, and therefore could not have come in as heirs under the original grant. But the implied entry of James Hamilton could not prejudice the superior's right in this way, because it could not be used to enable a stranger to enter as heir, or to enable James Hamilton himself to escape liability for composition if he were not the heir when the right to a casualty accrued.

This is a material difference between the implied entry under the statute and the entry obtained under the former law by actual charter. By the old law the casualty payable for the entry of a new vassal was necessarily fixed at the date of entry, because the entry discharged the claim. By the new law it is fixed when the right accrues, or when the action is brought, because the implied entry does not affect the claim. But by the former law the superior could not exact a year's rent as the price of a new charter, unless he thereby admitted strangers to the feu, from whom he would have no other opportunity of exacting compotion. The second branch of the case of Hastings v. Oswald shews that even when a new charter altered the destination the superior would not be entitled to composition on granting the charter if his right to demand it when a stranger substitute presented himself could be effectually reserved. On similar grounds it appears to me that he cannot exact a year's rent, because of its being uncertain at the date of the implied entry whether the title thereby confirmed would operate in favour of an heir or of a stranger at the date when the casualty should become due. The implied entry is not a recognition by the superior of a new vassal and his heirs, who may be strangers to the existing investiture, and therefore he is not entitled to be paid for it as if it involved such recognition. The pursuer's right to casualties remained after James Hamilton's entry exactly as it was before—a right to exact payment of a casualty on John's death, on the footing that his investiture was still the rule of the feu, and the successor's liability must be determined upon that footing, irrespective of the implied entry. If John had left heirs of his body, James would not have been his heir, and must have paid composition at his death. But since he was in fact the heir, he would have been liable only for relief on the same ground on which he could then have obtained a charter of confirmation for payment of relief under the former law.

No. 185.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

If James Hamilton would have been liable only for relief, it follows that the defender's liability is also for relief, because he is the heir both of James and of John, and might therefore have obtained a confirmation of the conveyances and infestments by which he holds the lands without paying a year's rent for it. But the form of the action against him brings out with remarkable clearness the contradiction which appears to me to make the pursuer's case untenable. He did not think proper to make any claim for casualty during James Hamilton's life, and in stating the claim against the present defender he had therefore to consider whether the casualty became due on the death of John or on the death of James. As the action is laid he founds his claim on the death of John as the last vassal. And this view may probably be supported on the ground that although James was entered by force of the statute he paid no casualty, and therefore that there is nothing to prevent the pursuer from alleging that he would under the old law have been entitled to sue a declarator of non-entry in consequence of the death of John. But then the pursuer's case must be that John Hamilton was the last entered vassal, or in other words, that nothing has occurred to disturb the investiture since the date of his entry, and accordingly he alleges as the ground of his action that a casualty has become due in consequence of the death of John Hamilton, "who was the vassal last vest and seised in the lands." This is said to be a technical and immaterial point. I venture to think, on the contrary, that it is of vital importance, because the superior has no action unless he can shew that but for the Act he would be entitled to sue a declarator of non-entry. Now, the only way in which the lands could have fallen into non-entry before the passing of this Act was by the death of the vassal last vest and seised as of fee. The foundation of the pursuer's action, therefore, is the averment that John Hamilton was the vassal last vest and seised in the lands. But that implies an averment that no other vassal has entered since his death, or, to use the language of the old law, to which the pursuer is required by the statute to appeal, that the fee is still vacant in consequence of his death. If these propositions cannot be substantiated the action fails. But then it follows that the investiture established by the original charter to John Hamilton of

No. 185. Rodgerton has not been changed for the purpose of this action. The superior's right to casualty, and the corresponding liability of the vassal, must be measured by the same investiture. And when the pursuer avers that John Hamilton was the last entered vassal, the casualty payable must of necessity be determined by the relation of his successor in the lands to his investiture, because that is the last investiture according to the pursuer's own statement. The pursuer cannot be permitted to contradict his own ground of action, and the condition of his action is that he has recognised no new vassal, or in other words, that he has made no change in the investiture since the entry of John Hamilton. He cannot be permitted to say that nobody has been recognised since John Hamilton, and therefore that John Hamilton's heirs are the only persons enfranchised, and at the same time to say that James was recognised during John's lifetime, and therefore that John's heir must pay composition. If the superior's right is to depend on the assumption, which the statute requires to be made, that John Hamilton was the last entered vassal, it appears to me to follow that the vassal's liability must be determined upon the same assumption. I cannot suppose that this admits of argument. The right and the liability must necessarily be reciprocal. These are not two different or separable things, but only two aspects of the same obligation. If the statute provides that the implied entry shall not be considered as a recognition so as to affect the liability of the vassal it follows of necessity that it shall not be considered as a change of the investiture so as to alter the right of the superior.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

But if this reasoning be erroneous, and the old investiture has been extinguished by the entry of James Dunlop Hamilton, the defender is the heir of the new investiture, and in that character is liable only for relief. It is of no consequence whether James paid a casualty or not if he is to be considered as an entered vassal for the purpose of the action. For it is decided that no casualty exigible from James can be demanded from the defender, and I do not understand that there is any difference of opinion upon this point. If the pursuer chose to waive his claim against an entered vassal he must submit to the loss. He cannot throw it upon a succeeding vassal.

The pursuer is in this dilemma. Either the investiture has not been changed since the entry of John, and in that case the defender is liable only for relief, because he is heir of the old investiture, or else it has been changed by the entry of James, and in that case the defender is still liable for relief only, because he is the heir of the new investiture. The pursuer may possibly be entitled to treat the entry of James as an alteration of the investiture. But if he so treats it he must accept the necessary legal consequence of that position. He cannot be permitted to maintain two contradictory propositions at one and the same time, and to say that James was duly entered during the lifetime of John, and therefore that the defender cannot have the benefit of his character as John's heir, and at the same time to say that James was not duly entered, and therefore that the defender takes no benefit from his character as heir of James.

The sounder view appears to me to be that the action lies against the defender as John's successor, and that his liability must be determined by his right to obtain a confirmation of the series of titles on which he holds the lands on the assumption that there has been no entry with the superior since that of John Hamilton. But if he were now in the position of demanding a charter he would be entitled to obtain it without payment, and his liability for the implied charter which the statute has given him must be determined by the same rule.

The effect of the whole series of enactments appears to me to be that the infeftment of a disponee during the lifetime of an entered vassal shall have the same feudal effect as a charter of confirmation under the former law ; that no casualty shall be exigible in respect of this implied entry until the lands fall into the position which under the former law would have been non-entry ; that when this event happens a casualty is to be exigible from the person who is at the time the last vassal's successor in the lands, and from no other person ; and lastly, that his successor shall be liable for the same casualty as he would have been required to pay by the former law if he had been demanding an entry at the date when the casualty is demanded upon the titles on which he then holds the lands. I do not think this view inconsistent with the decisions. What I take to have been decided is, that the actual successor in the lands must pay a casualty according to his own liability, because when he has once been entered by the registration of a conveyance in his favour he cannot put the last vassal's heir into his place. The ground of judgment is thus expressed by the Lord Chancellor in Lamont v. Rankin,—"The appellants are by the Act deemed and held to be duly entered, and if so, there is no vacant fief into which the heir could enter." I think it quite in conformity with the law so laid down to hold that the actual successor, who alone holds the fee, must pay the same casualty as he would have paid if instead of being entered by implication he had been required to enter under the former law. Therefore, if the successor is in fact the heir of the last vassal, when the right arises he shall pay relief. If he is a stranger, he must pay composition. If it is proved or admitted that he is in fact the heir, the question whether he can still make up a title in that character does not appear to arise under the statutory action, for the action does not, like the old declarator of non-entry, require the defender to make up a title or forfeit the lands. It merely requires that he shall pay a casualty. The only previous case in which the point now to be determined could have been raised was that of Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley. But in that case it was not raised, and therefore it was not decided. The decision was that an implied entry as disponee excluded a subsequent entry by the same person as heir of an extinguished mid-superiority. But no question was raised as to the amount of casualty payable, if it were decided that the title could not be completed otherwise than by the implied entry. But if Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley is to be taken as a decision in point it is not binding upon the whole Court, and ought not in my opinion to be followed.

LORD TRAYNER.—Applying the provisions of the Act of 1874 to the admitted facts of the present case, I think it clear (1) that James Hamilton was entered with his superior by force of statute in 1874 ; (2) that a new investiture was thus created, whereby the prior investiture was evacuated ; and (3) that in 1877, on the death of John Hamilton, a casualty became due to the superior, and could then have been exacted from James. Granting these propositions, it follows that the defender's claim to be entered as heir to John Hamilton cannot be sustained. After the completion of James's right by implied entry in 1874 there was no right left in John to which the defender could have served. The decision in the case of Ferrier's Trustees appears to me conclusive of this part of the case.

It is in accordance with the pursuer's argument to hold, as I do, that the result of the implied entry of James was to operate a change of the investiture, and to create a new investiture excluding the heirs of John Hamilton. But I have some difficulty in seeing how the pursuer can maintain that argument, and at the same time maintain the claim as put forward in his summons. The pursuer concludes for decree against the defender for a "casualty, being one year's rent of the lands," which has become due "in consequence of the death of John Hamilton . . . who was the vassal last vest and seised," &c. How could John Hamilton be the vassal last vest and seised when James became the vassal vest and seised in 1874? The pursuer explains this by saying that he had to follow the form of summons provided by the Act. But the schedule appended to the Act does not require him to state what is not the fact; it gives a form no doubt, which is to be followed "as nearly as may be"—but not to be followed, as I have said, irrespective of the conditions of the case. The importance, I suppose, of setting forth John as the last vassal is that the defender cannot bring himself as an heir within the investiture as it stood in John, and if not an heir, then he is necessarily a singular successor liable in composition. If the summons had set forth James as the vassal last vest and seised, the defender being admittedly his heir, it would have followed that he was liable only in relief. But turning from the conclusions of the summons to the averments in the condescendence, I find the facts to be thus stated (conds 4 and 5)—That James, in respect of his implied entry in 1874, became subject to payment of the casualty of composition "as a singular successor of" John, "when it should become payable on the death of the latter"; that the "said casualty" became exigible in 1877, when John died; that James died in 1886 without having made payment of "the said casualty"; that the defender is infeft in the lands in question in respect of a general disposition and settlement in his favour granted by James, and that in virtue of his infeftment he is liable to the pursuer "in payment of the casualty which had become due as aforesaid." That is, in a word, that as James did not pay the casualty exigible from him in 1877, the defender is now bound to pay it—not to pay a casualty in respect of his own entry in 1886, but to pay a casualty due by and exigible from his predecessor in the lands. The decision in Mounsey v. Palmer has settled that the defender is not liable for any casualty except that exigible in respect of his own entry, and the pursuer's claim as laid cannot in my opinion be sustained.

But apart from this, and assuming the present claim to be relevantly stated as a claim for the casualty due on the defender's own entry, the question is, what is the extent of the defender's liability—is it for composition or relief? That depends upon the character in which the defender stands to the person last entered, and it is admitted that the defender is the heir-at-law of James. It therefore appears to me that as heir of James, who was the vassal last vest and seised, the defender is liable in relief-duty only. The answer which is made to this, however, is, that the defender is not the heir of an enfranchised investiture recognised by the superior, James not having paid the composition exigible from him in 1877. I think there is a fallacy involved in this answer. (1) There is no recognition by the superior of James's entry required. It is recognised by the statute, and the superior cannot disregard it. (2) It is not payment that enfranchises an investiture, but the act of the superior admitting the vassal to his public holding. The act of the superior is essential; the payment may be called accidental. For a superior may, if he pleases, enfranchise an investiture without exacting any payment. He may, at his own pleasure, refuse to exact any payment; he may in a doubtful case accept relief-duty where he thinks composition due; he may accept half the amount of the casualty as a compromise rather than go to law about a disputed casualty. No. 185.

In all cases it lies absolutely within the pleasure of the superior to renounce in whole or in part the pecuniary advantage he may be entitled to derive from a change of investiture. But whatever he may elect to do in reference to the payment due to himself the enfranchisement of the investiture is not thereby affected. The enfranchisement is complete when the superior has recognised the new investiture by granting his writ of confirmation, either on or without consideration. Now, that being so, how stands the investiture of 1874? James, by recording his infeftment, became entered with the superior "to the same effect as if such superior had granted a writ of confirmation according to the existing law and practice" (Act of 1874, sec. 4, subsec. 2). It is not open to doubt that if under the old law—that is, as it stood prior to 1874—the superior had granted James a writ of confirmation, the investiture thereby created would have been enfranchised quite irrespective of what, if anything, had been paid for it. No conveyancer having that writ of confirmation in his hand would have asked on what consideration it had been granted. The fact of its being granted was the essential matter; the vassal under it was duly entered by its execution and delivery. But if the implied entry under the statute is to have all the effect of a writ of confirmation, then it must have the effect of enfranchising the investiture, and if that effect followed the investiture created by James's implied entry, then the defender, as heir of that investiture, owes the pursuer relief-duty and nothing more.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

There is this difference between the case of an entry by writ of confirmation granted under the former practice and the implied entry under the Act of 1874. The superior could formerly withhold his writ of confirmation until his casualty was paid; he has no such protection now, because the entry is completed by the vassal taking infeftment, an act which the superior cannot prevent or control. The statute, in view of this difference, provides that no implied entry shall be pleadable in answer to the superior's demand for a casualty—that is, as argued by the pursuer, "it is to be impossible for the vassal to avoid the claim by saying,—'I am already entered by force of the statute, and therefore no casualty on entry can possibly now be due by me.'" But this difference is only one affecting the mode in which the superior can make good or secure his pecuniary claim; it does not affect the legal consequences of the entry itself.

Again, if the payment of the casualty has anything to do with the question, which I think it has not, through whose fault is it that the casualty due on the entry of James has not been paid? That casualty was due in 1877, and then exigible. It was never demanded. Had the superior enforced his right the casualty would have been paid, and the defender would only have been liable on his entry in payment of relief. This will be conceded. Is the neglect of the superior to enforce his right to increase the burden on the defender? Suppose the feu-duty to be one penny Scots, and the yearly rental of the subjects £500, the defender will be liable for £500 (composition), or only one penny Scots (relief-duty), just as the superior enforces or neglects his rights. Surely that is not reasonable. If the superior suffers by his neglect, sibi imputet, the defender may justly claim to be dealt with as if the superior had done his duty by his own interests.

In my opinion the judgment of the Lord Ordinary is right. The defender is undoubtedly the heir of James, and succeeds to the lands in question as his

Hamilton.

I am of opinion that in the present case the defender is bound to pay composition and not relief-duty, for this reason, that on the passing of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, his author, James Dunlop Hamilton, was entered with the superior. The effect of that entry was not merely to evacuate the mid-superiority in the person of John Hamilton, second of Greenbank, and thus sweep away the old investiture, but also to make the vassal entered under the new investiture liable in a composition (he being a singular successor), although payment of it could not be demanded until the death of John Hamilton, second of Greenbank. In other words, I think that the amount of the casualty which would have been payable at the date of the implied entry had the vassal been then entered under the old law cannot be affected by any change of circumstances which may have taken place subsequently to infeftment, as, for instance in the present case, by the accident of the vassal from whom a casualty is demanded happening at the time when the demand is made to be heir of the vassal who last paid a casualty.

If it had been intended that the character in which the vassal should be held as entered, and the amount of the casualty to be paid should be determined as at the date of a casualty becoming due, it would have been enacted that on the death of the vassal who last paid a casualty the person then infeft in the lands should be held to be duly entered with the superior. Or it might have been provided that the superior should not on a casualty becoming due be entitled in respect of a prior implied entry to claim any other or higher casualty than he would have been entitled to had such implied entry not been previously taken. This would have suspended the effect of the implied entry as regarded the amount of the casualty as well as the time at which it might be demanded. In the view which I take of the statute, however, an implied entry takes immediate effect except in so far as it is otherwise expressly directed, and as no exception is made in regard to the amount of the casualty to be paid that must be taken to be the amount which would have been payable if demanded at the date of the implied entry.

The defender relies on the provision of the statute (Act, 1874, sec. 4, subsec. 4) that no implied entry shall be pleadable in defence against the superior's action for a casualty, and it is argued with much force that if an implied entry is not to be pleaded against the superior it should not be pleaded in his favour to the effect of enlarging his rights. The answer is, that while this provision is made in the superior's favour the converse is not enacted, and cannot, I think, be implied and read into the statute.

Again, it is said that the superior's rights will be enlarged if the pursuer's contention is sustained. This is true; but Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley and Rankin's Trustees v. Lamont establish that this consideration is not of itself sufficient to override the fair construction of the statute. No doubt this is a harder case for the vassal than if he were seeking to put forward an heir who was not also proprietor of the lands, but the defender is not in a more favourable position, because the old investiture having been extinguished in consequence of James Dunlop Hamilton's implied entry he can only claim through the new investiture, which has not been enfranchised.

The facts of the case indeed are identical with those in Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley. It may be that the defence here is rested on more plausible grounds, because it is not sought to revive an extinct mid-superiority. The defender, however, seeks to avail himself of the old investiture by founding on his relationship to the vassal whose mid-superiority was extinguished.

It is true that the form of the title is not conclusive, but the question turns No. 185.
not upon the form of the title, but upon the character of the vassal at the time July 18, 1889.
when the title is made up. If he is then heir of the existing investiture he Stuart v.
will be dealt with as an heir; if his position is that of a stranger to it, he will Hamilton.
be treated as a singular successor. In the case of Mackintosh, 13 R. 692, the vassal was at the date of the implied entry heir of the existing investiture, and might have demanded an entry as such. Again, in the older case of M'Kenzie, 1777, the vassal, although he made up his title so as to comply with the provisions of the newly executed deed of entail, was heir of the existing or prior investiture, and was for that reason held entitled to be entered on payment of relief.

In the present case, however, when John Hamilton (2) died in 1877, James Dunlop Hamilton was already fully entered as a singular successor and could not have thereafter reverted to the old investiture. The defender is in no better position than his author. This case must be taken as if the question had arisen in 1877, and if James Dunlop Hamilton would then have been held to be a singular successor, the impediment created by his implied entry cannot, if the view which I take of the case is correct, be ignored in a question with his dispensee and heir, the defender.

I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary's judgment should be altered.

LORD KYLLACHY.—The question in this case is, whether the defender is liable in a causality of relief or of composition? and there are, as I understand the case, two views on which it is maintained that he is only liable in relief. The first is, that James Hamilton, his immediate predecessor, was duly entered with the superior, and that he is James Hamilton's heir, and that that being so, it is of no consequence that James Hamilton paid no casualty upon his entry, or that his entry was only an implied entry under the statute. The other view, which is alternative, is, that the defender is entitled, for the purposes of the present (statutory) action, to treat the old investiture in favour of John Hamilton of Greenbank and his heirs as still subsisting, and to connect himself as heir with the old investiture, and so pay only an heir's casualty in the same manner as under the old law.

It is obvious that the questions thus raised depend for their answer on the precise effect which is to be given—in fixing the pecuniary rights of the superior —to the implied entries under the statute intermediate between the entry of the last vassal who paid a casualty, and that of the existing proprietor, who is the defender in the statutory action.

The case would be clear enough if those implied entries were to receive effect all round. It would also be clear enough if they were to be ignored all round.
It is admittedly, however, impossible to go that length in either direction. If the implied entries were to receive full effect—as if in each case there had been a writ of confirmation under the old law,—there would not only be an implied enfranchisement of new investitures without payment of casualty, but the fee would, or might, be kept always (impliedly) full, so that no casualty could ever be demanded. On the other hand, if the implied entries were for the purposes of the statutory action to be wholly ignored the result would be to conflict not only with the decisions of the Court in the case of Ferrier's Trustees, 4 R. 738, but also with the decision of the Court in the case of Rosemore's

No. 185. Trustees, 5 R. 201, and with that of the House of Lords in the case of Lamont v. Rankin, 7 R. (H. of L.) 10.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

The question therefore really is (1) how far the view first above mentioned can be maintained short of ignoring altogether the proviso that implied entries shall not be pleadable against the superior, and (2) how far the view second above mentioned can be maintained short of ignoring the decisions in the cases of Rossmore's Trustees and Lamont v. Rankin. I exclude in the meantime the case of Ferrier's Trustees, it being at least doubtful how far the present question was in that case argued.

(1) In my opinion it is impossible for the defender without violating the express words of the statute to found on the implied entry of James Hamilton (the last impliedly entered vassal) as foreclosing all reference to former investitures, and enabling the defender to take his stand on the simple fact that he is the heir of James Hamilton. The statute, dealing with the statutory action, provides expressly that "no implied entry shall be pleadable against the superior," and I see no reason why this proviso should not receive effect according to its terms. No doubt it is necessary (because it is necessarily implied) to confine the proviso to implied entries on which no casualty has been paid (just as it is necessary to make a similar implication in the schedule in construing the words which refer to the death of the vassal "last vest and seised"). But (subject to that restriction which cannot help the defender) I see no reason for denying effect to words which seem to be plain, and not only to be plain, but to be essential to the statutory scheme. In particular, I am not able to discover any ground for holding as suggested that the proviso only affects the mode in which the superior can make good or secure his pecuniary claim, and does not affect the legal consequences of the implied entry itself. In my opinion the whole object of the proviso was to exclude the legal consequences of the implied entry in so far as the same might prejudice the pecuniary rights of the superior.

Moreover, it is not, I think, possible for the defender in this view of the case to stop short at treating the implied entry of the last vassal as an enfranchisement of the last vassal's investiture. If the implied entry is good for that purpose, it must also, it is thought, be good to the effect of postponing the superior's right of action in many cases quite indefinitely. No doubt James Hamilton, the last impliedly entered vassal in this case, happens to be dead, but if he had been alive the question would have been just the same. And if the view now under consideration were well founded the superior would have had no action as now on the death of John Hamilton of Greenbank, but would have had to wait until the death of James Hamilton, and if James Hamilton had happened to dispoise inter vivos to a donee who took infertment he would have had to wait until the death of that donee. Now, as I already said, I do not think it possible to maintain that such is the meaning of the statute, nor indeed do I understand that the defender would so contend.

(2) It remains, however, to consider how far it is possible to take the other view, viz., to ignore the implied entries for the purposes of the statutory action, and at the same time to give due effect to the decisions to which reference has been made.

Apart from those decisions, I quite follow and appreciate the defender's argument. In particular, I accede to the proposition that the superior's whole rights and remedies are for the purposes of this question to be found in the 4th subsection of section 4, and that there is nothing in the statute which gives him right to demand a casualty except the provision in subsection 4 to the effect that "when but for the Act the superior would have been entitled to sue a declarator of non-entry, he shall have right to bring the statutory action against the proprietor of the lands for the time." I also accede to the proposition that under the old law no declarator of non-entry could have been brought when the fee was full, and that that being so, the superior requires as the basis of his statutory action to ignore the intermediate implied entries, because standing those implied entries, the fee may be, and indeed generally will be, full. All this I think quite sound, and thinking so, I acknowledge the force of the argument, that as the superior ignores and must ignore the implied entries as filling the fee, he cannot at the same time object to the defender ignoring the implied entries as extinguishing the old investitures.

No. 185.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

But, in the first place, in construing a statute like the present it does not necessarily follow that all its provisions are in precise logical symmetry. The question always is, what does the statute mean, and it may very well be that, logically or illogically, the purpose and meaning of the statute was to entitle the superior to ignore the implied entries so far as they might be pleaded as excluding his action, and yet to found upon them as excluding any attempt on the part of the existing proprietor to connect himself with extinguished investitures. It is certainly the case that while it is expressly provided that "no implied entry shall be pleadable in defence against such action" it is nowhere said that such implied entry shall not be pleadable in support of such action.

In the second place, however, I am unable to regard this question as still open. The case of Ferrier's Trustees v. Bayley, is, it is hardly disputed, expressly in point, and I doubt whether it is sufficient to displace the authority of that judgment that the point now taken does not appear to have been specially argued. But however that may be, there is no disputing the authority of the case of Rosemore's Trustees or of the case of Lamont v. Rankin, which went to the House of Lords. And I am quite unable to distinguish this case from those cases. It is true that the defender here is himself the heir of the old investiture, and is here tendering himself, and that in the cases in question the defenders sought to tender heirs who happened to be third parties. But having carefully read the judgments in those previous cases, I am unable to discover that they or any of them proceeded on this distinction. It was nowhere, so far as I can see, suggested that notwithstanding subsequent implied entries in favour of strangers, the statute left open the old investitures for the benefit of the heir of the old investiture if he happened to be the true owner of the estate, foreclosing merely the right to put forward—in answer to the superior's action—anybody but the true (beneficial) owner of the estate. That could hardly, I think, have been held consistently with the subsequent decision of the Court in the case of the Duke of Hamilton v. Guild, 10 R. 1117, which expressly affirmed the right of the defender in the statutory action if uninfert to exclude the superior's claim for composition by putting forward a third party, not the owner of the lands at all, and making up a title in the person of that third party as the heir of the subsisting investiture. Neither do I think it is possible to hold that the principle of the judgments in question was merely this—that the old investiture was still open, but that entry being abolished nobody could be put forward to connect with the old investiture who was not in a position to obtain infertment and thus become a successor in the lands. That would rest the judgments in question on a mere technicality, and one which could have been easily overcome,

No. 185. viz., that the heirs there put forward had not had dispositions executed and recorded in their favour, or that the defenders did not propose to execute and procure the recording of such dispositions. It appears to me that if this had been all that was meant it would have been somewhere expressed, and moreover that the unimportance of the judgments—which in this view would have been clear—would have been speedily recognised. The true principle of the judgments was, however, in my opinion different, and was the same in all the cases (Ferrier's Trustees included), and was simply this—that however the superior's action may be laid, and whatever he may require to assume fictioe statuti as the basis of his action—implied entries under the statute in favour of strangers have the effect of ~~extinguishing all previous investitures, and of forwarding all recourse to those extinguished investitures for the purpose of enabling any person to connect himself therewith as heir.~~

I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer is here entitled to prevail, and I have only to add that I do not consider that the case of Mackintosh touches the present question. In the case of Mackintosh there was no change of investiture operated. Giving the fullest effect to the only implied entry which there occurred, the old investiture remained intact. The old investiture was in favour of Æneas Mackintosh and his heirs-at-law, and the disposition which he executed, and which was impliedly confirmed, was in favour of his heir-at-law. And that appears to have been the basis of the judgment. It is true that the case in question, and the previous cases on which it followed, may be held to affirm the proposition that under the old law a person might claim entry on relief who had so made up his title that he was no longer in a position to serve. But the important fact which distinguishes all those cases from the present is that at the date when the heir in those cases made up his title by confirmation he was in a position to serve. By making up his title by confirmation he merely exercised an option affecting the form of his title, and in the exercise or non-exercise of which the superior had no interest.

At advising in Second Division,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—After much deliberation and consideration the consulted Judges have given their opinions in this case, and these opinions disclose the great difficulties raised by it. For their Lordships are divided as nearly equally as an uneven number admits of, being five of them in favour of reversing the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and four of them for adhering to it. The responsibility of this Division is thus rather increased than lessened by our having sought the assistance of our brethren, for instead of their deliberations having disposed of the difficulty which led to their being consulted, the case comes back to us hanging in the balance as before, and we have to take our choice between very learned and closely reasoned opinions which are in direct conflict with each other.

After studying these opinions and the whole case, my judgment, arrived at in the end without any substantial doubt, is in accordance with that of the majority of the consulted Judges. That being my opinion, I might have contented myself with expressing it, knowing that I could add nothing of weight to their reasons. But in a case of so great importance, which in its ultimate decision must rule so many and so important interests, it may be considered desirable that the views of individual Judges should be expressed on the points which affect its decision.

In doing so, however, it will be unnecessary to recapitulate the facts which are already so clearly stated in more than one opinion, and about which there is no controversy.

No. 185.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.
Hamilton.

The first question is,—Did every proprietor holding as a singular successor become at the passing of the Act of 1874 the direct vassal of the superior? This I hold to be conclusively settled by the decisions already pronounced. It is clearly expressed in the Lord President's judgment in the case of Rosemore's Trustees. The refusal to allow the defender in that case to put forward the heir of the previously entered vassal, so as to limit his payment to the superior to relief, is justified by the Lord President in these words,—“I come to the conclusion, certainly not without much consideration, but also in the end, I am bound to say, without any difficulty, that the effect of a person taking infeftment subsequent to the passing of the Act of 1874” (which is the same thing as his being infeft at the date of the Act), “is to enter him as a singular successor with the superior, and of course to subject him to all the conditions of such an entry as it stood before the statute, and, among other things, to the payment of a composition.” This view of the law is fully upheld in the other cases which are referred to in the opinions of the consulted Judges, including a decision by the House of Lords. The question is not in my opinion an open one. But if it be assumed that the laying of a case before the whole Court re-opens questions which have already been made subject of decision, then my opinion is, that apart altogether from previous decision, the view contended for by the pursuer of the effect of the statute is sound, and ought to be sustained.

The opening part of subsection 2 of section 4 of the Act of 1874 makes the change in the law in very clear terms. By it a proprietor infeft at or after the passing of the Act is to be deemed and held, as at the date of registration of his infeftment, duly entered, as if the superior had granted a writ of confirmation. No enactment could be more clear and distinct, and if the clause had stopped there no possible doubt could have existed as to its effect. But there is modification by proviso, and the modifications require careful consideration in order to see whether they so affect the direct enactment as to give it a different meaning from that which its words import. Here it is noteworthy that the modifications are specific and sharply defined. There is no suggestion of modification to be implied. The direct modifications which have a bearing on the present question are these,—(1) That although the proprietor is held to be entered by registration of his infeftment he is not necessarily to be liable at once to pay a casualty, but only becomes liable at the time at which, under the conditions subsisting before the statute, the superior could have demanded it; (2) that his implied entry shall not also imply, as a writ of confirmation would have done, that all previous casualties were discharged, and shall not be pleadable in defence against the superior's action for a casualty; and (3) that although no lands are to be deemed to be in non-entry, and no action of declarator of non-entry can be raised, yet that the superior may raise an action of declarator and for payment of any casualty exigible at the date of the action, decree in which is to have the same results as a decree of declarator of non-entry until the casualty is paid.

These are practically all the statutory modifications of the enacting words in subsection 2 of section 4. There is nothing said in that or other subsections to modify to any other effect the declaration that registration of infeftment implies entry. In particular, it is not said that the entry by force of statute does not extinguish mid-superiority. It is not said that when a casualty is exigible it is

No. 185. viz., that the heirs there put forward had not had dispositions executed and recorded in their favour, or that the defenders did not propose to execute and procure the recording of such dispositions. It appears to me that if this had been all that was meant it would have been somewhere expressed, and moreover that the unimportance of the judgments—which in this view would have been clear—would have been speedily recognised. The true principle of the judgments was, however, in my opinion different, and was the same in all the cases (Ferrier's Trustees included), and was simply this—that however the superior's action may be laid, and whatever he may require to assume fictioe statuti as the basis of his action—implied entries under the statute in favour of strangers have the effect of ~~extinguishing all previous investitures, and of forwarding all recourse to those extinguished investitures for the purpose of enabling any person to connect himself therewith as heir.~~

I am therefore of opinion that the pursuer is here entitled to prevail, and I have only to add that I do not consider that the case of Mackintosh touches the present question. In the case of Mackintosh there was no change of investiture operated. Giving the fullest effect to the only implied entry which there occurred, the old investiture remained intact. The old investiture was in favour of Æneas Mackintosh and his heirs-at-law, and the disposition which he executed, and which was impliedly confirmed, was in favour of his heir-at-law. And that appears to have been the basis of the judgment. It is true that the case in question, and the previous cases on which it followed, may be held to affirm the proposition that under the old law a person might claim entry on relief who had so made up his title that he was no longer in a position to serve. But the important fact which distinguishes all those cases from the present is that at the date when the heir in those cases made up his title by confirmation he was in a position to serve. By making up his title by confirmation he merely exercised an option affecting the form of his title, and in the exercise or non-exercise of which the superior had no interest.

At advising in Second Division,—

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—After much deliberation and consideration the consulted Judges have given their opinions in this case, and these opinions disclose the great difficulties raised by it. For their Lordships are divided as nearly equally as an uneven number admits of, being five of them in favour of reversing the judgment of the Lord Ordinary, and four of them for adhering to it. The responsibility of this Division is thus rather increased than lessened by our having sought the assistance of our brethren, for instead of their deliberations having disposed of the difficulty which led to their being consulted, the case comes back to us hanging in the balance as before, and we have to take our choice between very learned and closely reasoned opinions which are in direct conflict with each other.

After studying these opinions and the whole case, my judgment, arrived at in the end without any substantial doubt, is in accordance with that of the majority of the consulted Judges. That being my opinion, I might have contented myself with expressing it, knowing that I could add nothing of weight to their reasons. But in a case of so great importance, which in its ultimate decision must rule so many and so important interests, it may be considered desirable that the views of individual Judges should be expressed on the points which affect its decision.

In doing so, however, it will be unnecessary to recapitulate the facts which are already so clearly stated in more than one opinion, and about which there is no controversy.

The first question is,—Did every proprietor holding as a singular successor become at the passing of the Act of 1874 the direct vassal of the superior? This I hold to be conclusively settled by the decisions already pronounced. It is clearly expressed in the Lord President's judgment in the case of Rossmore's Trustees. The refusal to allow the defender in that case to put forward the heir of the previously entered vassal, so as to limit his payment to the superior to relief, is justified by the Lord President in these words,—“I come to the conclusion, certainly not without much consideration, but also in the end, I am bound to say, without any difficulty, that the effect of a person taking infestment subsequent to the passing of the Act of 1874” (which is the same thing as his being infest at the date of the Act), “is to enter him as a singular successor with the superior, and of course to subject him to all the conditions of such an entry as it stood before the statute, and, among other things, to the payment of a composition.” This view of the law is fully upheld in the other cases which are referred to in the opinions of the consulted Judges, including a decision by the House of Lords. The question is not in my opinion an open one. But if it be assumed that the laying of a case before the whole Court re-opens questions which have already been made subject of decision, then my opinion is, that apart altogether from previous decision, the view contended for by the pursuer of the effect of the statute is sound, and ought to be sustained.

The opening part of subsection 2 of section 4 of the Act of 1874 makes the change in the law in very clear terms. By it a proprietor infest at or after the passing of the Act is to be deemed and held, as at the date of registration of his infestment, duly entered, as if the superior had granted a writ of confirmation. No enactment could be more clear and distinct, and if the clause had stopped there no possible doubt could have existed as to its effect. But there is modification by proviso, and the modifications require careful consideration in order to see whether they so affect the direct enactment as to give it a different meaning from that which its words import. Here it is noteworthy that the modifications are specific and sharply defined. There is no suggestion of modification to be implied. The direct modifications which have a bearing on the present question are these,—(1) That although the proprietor is held to be entered by registration of his infestment he is not necessarily to be liable at once to pay a casualty, but only becomes liable at the time at which, under the conditions subsisting before the statute, the superior could have demanded it; (2) that his implied entry shall not also imply, as a writ of confirmation would have done, that all previous casualties were discharged, and shall not be pleadable in defence against the superior's action for a casualty; and (3) that although no lands are to be deemed to be in non-entry, and no action of declarator of non-entry can be raised, yet that the superior may raise an action of declarator and for payment of any casualty exigible at the date of the action, decree in which is to have the same results as a decree of declarator of non-entry until the casualty is paid.

These are practically all the statutory modifications of the enacting words in subsection 2 of section 4. There is nothing said in that or other subsections to modify to any other effect the declaration that registration of infestment implies entry. In particular, it is not said that the entry by force of statute does not distinguish mid-superiority. It is not said that when a casualty is exigible it is not to be that which, but for the postponing proviso, would have been exigible at once. It is not said that the postponement of the time for the enforcement of the ordinary pecuniary conditions of confirmation is to expose the superior, in whose favour these conditions exist, to having their value modified by the subsequent course of events. It is not said that the character of the casualty which is the sequence of the entry forced on the superior by the statute without present payment of casualty, is to depend upon the chapter of accidents occurring after the entry. Had such anomalous results been intended, the intention could have been easily expressed. As was pointed out in the House of Lords in Rankin's case, "a few simple words" would have sufficed to express such intention of the Legislature, had the intention really existed. Even admitting that implication might be enough, it would require to be necessary implication, and it can scarcely be contended that there exists any necessity for such implication.

Keeping in view these three things—first, what the statute enacts; second, what modification it applies to the enactment; and third, what modifications it does not apply—let us now consider the grounds of the judgment of the Lord Ordinary. These are mainly two in number—First, that as the payment of a casualty in respect of James's entry under the statute is postponed by statutory proviso till the death of the vassal last vest and seised in the lands, therefore, as James ceased to be a mere presumptive heir at that date, and became the heir de facto, he is entitled to limit his payment to that applicable to an heir, and the superior cannot demand a composition. Second, that whether this be so or not, the casualty is now one of relief only, William being the heir, and succeeding as heir—that is, as heir of John's investiture.

Now, taking this last contention first, it appears to me to be fallacious to speak of William as being the heir of the investiture of John, as some of my brethren do. In Ferrier's case it was distinctly held that no person could now tender himself as heir to one who had disposed away the property prior to the Act of 1874. By that Act the right and title of such a one were absolutely taken away whenever registration of the disponent's infestment was completed. Nothing remained in him as the basis on which alone such a tendering of his heir as would have been competent before the statute could rest. If the question be asked, who after the passing of the Act was the vassal of the superior, liable to him in the feu-duties affecting the lands, and the performance of all the obligations of feu, the answer plainly is "not John, but James." James's entry by virtue of the statute is declared to be "to the same effect as if the superior had granted a writ of confirmation." So certainly is this the effect of the statutory enactment that it is only by special proviso that the superior's claim against the former vassal and his heirs is reserved to him "until notice of the change of ownership shall have been given to" him, and this again is declared to be without prejudice to the previous proprietor or his heirs, &c., recovering all feu-duties he "may have had to pay in consequence of any failure or omission to give such notice." I am therefore unable to understand how it can be held that William has any defence to this action on the ground that he is the heir of John. John's right ceased to exist by force of statute in 1874. James could not therefore succeed to John when John died in 1877, for John was divested, and that being so, neither can William claim the character of heir of John's investiture. The Lord Ordinary, and those of my brethren who are in favour of upholding his judgment, found strongly on the case of Mackintosh in support of the opposite view. But I must confess that I am unable to understand why they should rely upon Mackintosh's case at all. If John's investiture ceased to exist in 1874, then Mackintosh's case cannot apply. If it did not cease to exist, and William can take advantage of it, then there is no need to appeal to Mackintosh's case in support of his right to satisfy the superior's claim for a casualty by a casualty of relief only. It is trite law that if the person succeeding as heir is to be entered, the superior must enter him for relief. And if James had not been entered till 1877, at John's death, the case we are dealing with would have been a different one altogether. I therefore do not see even the purpose for which Mackintosh's case is founded on. In the view I take of that case it has no application to the present. There the vassal from whom a casualty was demanded was, as regarded one-half of the estate, which he took only on the death of the previous vassal, the heir of investiture entitled to enter by special service. It was held that having that right he was not debarred from pleading it against the demand for the greater casualty for the whole property, merely because having the right to the whole by the testament of the last proprietor he had taken infestment as a singular successor thereunder, he being at the same time his heir in relation to a half. That comes to nothing more than this, that if a vassal entered by virtue of the statute has the character of heir of the already enfranchised investiture, he can maintain that the investiture is continued in his person, and can therefore claim to limit his payment of casualty accordingly, notwithstanding that the form in which he has made up his title is that appropriate to a singular successor. That which was in his predecessor, and which could pass to him by right as heir, he was entitled to found upon in any question as to what casualty was due to the superior on his entry under the statute. His relation at the time of the statutory entry being that of heir to a pro indiviso half of the estate, he was held entitled to plead that relation in the question of composition or relief. Here there is no such case. James was in 1874 only heir-presumptive to John, and therefore not in a position to take anything as heir. He, when he obtained his entry in that year, did so solely on the right obtained from John by disposition, and therefore fell to be dealt with as a stranger in the question of payment of casualty when that should become exigible. That this brings about a claim for a greater casualty than might have been the case had the Act not been passed is no reason for not giving effect to the statute. As Lord Cairns pointed out in the case of Lamont, such a consideration will not justify the interpolation of words into the statute upon an assumption that the Legislature intended what the legislative enactment does not express.

But then it is said—and this is the other ground on which the Lord Ordinary's judgment is supported—that as James, though only the heir-presumptive of John at the time when he was entered by force of statute in 1874, was in point of fact his heir when he died, James was entitled as at 1877 to satisfy the superior's claim for a casualty by payment as for relief only. This view is based on the principle that the casualty must be determined "by the character of the applicant for entry, and not by the form of his title," as Lord Kinnear points out. But the answer seems to me to be this, that James was not in 1877 an "applicant for entry." He was entered at the passing of the Act in 1874 "to the same effect as if the superior had granted a writ of confirmation." It seems to me impossible to maintain that if there had been no words in the statute postponing exaction of casualties a demand in 1874 for a casualty could have been resisted by James, and if payment of casualty could not have been resisted, there could have been no pretence for limiting it to relief. It was the confirmation in the case of a singular successor, which was impliedly effected in James's case by the passing of the Act of 1874. It is quite true that prior to 1874 a singular successor could by the device of tendering the heir for entry limit the casualty to relief. But it has been expressly decided that the singular successor cannot now tender the heir. What is the difference in this case? It is only that the heir as to whom it is suggested that he might have been tendered in 1877 is the same person as the singular successor, it happening to be the fact that at the time of John's death James was his heir. But if Lord Cairns's doctrine in Lamont's case must be accepted, that "the appellants" [i.e., the singular successors] "are by the Act deemed and held to be truly entered, and if so, there is no vacant fief into which the heir could enter," then the distinction between the two cases is a distinction without a difference. Lord Cairns's words may be applied to this case thus—James is by the Act deemed and held to be truly entered, and if so, there is no vacant fief to which he—though on the death of John he proved to be the heir—can enter. The death of John added nothing to James's right or title. There was in 1877 nothing left in John for James to take up as John's heir. The death of John had only one practical effect. It put an end to the statutory postponement of the payment due to the superior for the enfranchisement of that entry which was already completed as if by writ of confirmation in 1874. I am confirmed in this view by the knowledge that it was held by so high an authority in the feudal law as the late Lord Curriehill, who in his opinion in the unreported case of Sturrock v. Carruthers' Trustees in 1879, after stating the rule that the heir cannot now be put forward so as to evade payment of a composition, says—"This rule must take effect where the person whose entry is implied happens, after his infestment as a singular successor of the original vassal, to become also the heir of that vassal."

Some stress is laid by my brethren who are in favour of adhering to the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor upon the form of the action, which proceeds, following the form in the schedule, to describe the heir on whose death a casualty became exigible, namely, John, as "the vassal last vest and seised in the lands." The view taken is that this description of John implies—to use Lord Kinnear's words—"an averment that no other vassal has entered since his death, or, to use the language of the old law, to which the pursuer is required by the statute to appeal, that the fee is still vacant in consequence of his death." This reasoning seems to me to ignore the fact that the statute creates an anomaly by its implied entry and postponed exigibility of the casualty, which, but for the proviso, would have been at once exigible. This anomaly necessarily causes difficulty in the formal procedure for obtaining a decree on the occurrence of the event which removes the bar to exaction. It requires to be enacted that "no implied entry shall be pleadable against" the superior's action when the event has occurred. And accordingly the form of action passes by all such implied entries, and the vassal, to the occurrence of whose death the right to enforce payment of a casualty is postponed, is for the purposes of that action (which passes by implied entries) dealt with as the vassal who was last vest and seised, in contradistinction to the vassal who is impliedly entered, and from whom the superior demands a casualty by his action. That this is the sound view of the meaning of the form in schedule B appears in my judgment very clearly when consideration is given to the expressions used in the Act itself to describe the old and new vassals in the case of implied entries under the statute, where it is dealing with the rights of the superior, both as reserved and as taken away, in the case of such implied entries. In subsection 2 of section 4 two persons are contrasted, the vassal who is impliedly entered, and the vassal who was entered before him. The words which the statute uses to describe the latter are "the proprietor last entered." Thus it is enacted that notwithstanding the "implied entry the proprietor last entered in the lands, and his heirs and representatives, shall continue personally liable" for feu-duties, &c., "until notice of change of ownership is given to the superior." And again the right is conferred upon "the proprietor last entered in the lands to recover from the entered proprietor of the lands all feu-duties which such proprietor last entered may have had to pay in consequence of any failure or omission to give such notice," and all remedies competent to the superior are to be held to be assigned "to the proprietor last entered in the lands, and his foresaids" for recovery of such sums from the entered proprietor. The same expression "proprietor last entered in the lands" is again used in reference to the preservation of evidence of the notice of change of ownership, which is to save him from being still liable to pay feu-duties after the implied entry. And accordingly in schedule A the instructions for drawing up the notice direct that after the words "which formerly belonged to," the name "of the last entered vassal" is to be inserted.

No. 185.

July 18, 1889.
Stuart v.

Now, nothing can be more clear than this, that the statute in the passages I have quoted adopts the words "proprietor last entered in the lands" to describe the proprietor who was entered but has been divested by implied entry of another, and the words "the entered proprietor of the lands" to describe the proprietor who is entered by the statutory implied entry. The two expressions are used in contrast to designate the two proprietors, the old and divested proprietor, and the new and impliedly entered proprietor. Such being the distinctive expressions used in the statute itself, and they being in no way ambiguous when they occur in the statute as to their application, it appears to me that all difficulty which might be supposed to exist regarding the wording of the statutory form of summons in schedule B is removed. In that summons the word "last" is used in the same sense in which it is used in the statute itself. The words "the death of C, who was the vassal last vest and seised," do not, in my opinion, mean who was such vassal when he died, but mean who was the vassal last entered, in contrast to the vassal who, previous to C's death, had entry effected for him by statutory implication, and is thus the entered proprietor of the lands. The words in the enacting clauses cannot be read in any other sense, and the words in the schedule can be read in the same sense, and if they can be so read, then they must be so read—it not being allowable to assume repugnancy—and if so read, all the difficulties suggested disappear.

I have only further to add that I do not think the result is affected by the fact that William has succeeded to James. It is said that as James was entered by implication, and William succeeds James as his heir, that therefore William is liable as for relief only. But this contention is directly in the teeth of the statutory proviso that "such implied entry shall not prejudice or affect the right or title of any superior to any casualties, &c., which may be due or exigible in respect of the lands at or prior to the date of such entry." Now, William's entry is an implied entry, and at the time at which it took place a casualty was due and exigible for the enfranchisement of James's entry. William therefore cannot plead his implied entry to debar the superior from making good out of

On 6th March following the pursuer lodged a minute, in which she craved the Court to allow her to amend her petition, "in order that she may sue the action at her instance as 'executrix-dative qua widow of the late George Turnbull, tinsmith, Jedburgh, and as an individual,' or otherwise to sist process until a supplementary action is brought at the pursuer's instance as executrix-dative of her said husband, in order that the actions may be conjoined."

On 21st March the Sheriff-substitute refused to grant the crave of the minute.

Proof was thereafter led in the cause, and on 13th June 1889 the Sheriff-substitute assoilzied the defender.

The pursuer appealed to the Court of Session, and argued that the Sheriff had erred in refusing the crave of the minute of 3d December. The 24th section of the Sheriff Court Act of 1876 appointed the Sheriff to allow any amendment on the record "for the purposes of determining the real question in controversy." The "real question" was the question raised in the petition, and the provision covered the amending of a title, such as the present, where a person suing as an individual sought to be allowed to sue as an executor. In the case of Smith,<sup>1</sup> Lord Dundrennan alone expressed an opinion to the effect that this was incompetent. The case of Morison<sup>2</sup> was not in point. Besides, the clause founded on in the Act of 1876 gave the Court entirely new powers.

The respondent was not called upon.

LORD PRESIDENT.—The only ground on which it is contended that we should allow this proposed amendment is founded upon the 24th section of the Sheriff Court Act of 1876. The power of amendment which is introduced by that Act, and in the Court of Session Act of 1868, places a very valuable discretion in the hands of the Court, and if the power is kept within reasonable bounds, it is for many reasons most expedient. But the discretion must be carefully watched and safe-guarded, because it may be carried too far. I think the present proposal carries that discretionary power of amendment beyond the length which is contemplated by the statute. The power is thus worded,—“The Sheriff may at any time amend any error or defect in the record in any action upon such terms as to expenses and otherwise as to the Sheriff may seem proper, and all such amendments as may be necessary for the purposes of determining in the action the real question in controversy between the parties shall be so made.”

In the first place, I do not think the fault which it is proposed to remedy here is an error or defect in the record; it is rather a want of title appearing upon the face of the record. And in the next place, the amendment cannot be said to be proposed for the purposes of determining the real question in controversy between the parties. The real question upon the issue joined in the Sheriff Court was whether the defender was indebted to the pursuer as an individual, which it is now admitted he was not. I am therefore of opinion that the 24th section of the Act of 1876 does not apply.

We therefore fall back upon the question whether it is competent to bring an action to alter the law on this subject; and I am of opinion that the Sheriff Court Act does not do so. I therefore hold that it is not competent for the pursuer either to have herself sisted as a new pursuer, as she asks in the minute, nor to have the summons amended to the effect of allowing her character of executrix to be inserted in it. I cannot do more with the case at present, as the pursuer avers that the debt is due to her as an individual. . . .”

MRS AGNES WOOD OR TURNBULL brought an action in the Sheriff Court at Jedburgh against James Veitch for payment of board for the defender's child. After the action was raised the pursuer was decerned executrix-dative to her husband. 1st Division. Sheriff of Roxburghshire. M.

The defender stated that if there was a debt, it was due to the pursuer's husband, who had died a short time before the action was brought, and pleaded (2) No title to sue.

On 3d December 1888 the pursuer lodged a minute, in which she designed herself as executrix-dative qua relict of her deceased husband, and craved to be allowed to sist herself as a pursuer for all right and interest competent to her late husband.

On 24th January 1889 the Sheriff-substitute (Speirs) repelled the defender's plea hoc statu, and allowed a proof.

The defender appealed to the Sheriff (Jameson), who, on 26th February following, pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recalls the Sheriff-substitute's interlocutor of 24th January 1889; refuses the crave of the minute, No. 8 of process, and refuses also the pursuer's motion (made at the debate), alternatively to the said minute, to be allowed to amend the petition by adding after the pursuer's designation, the words 'as executrix of the deceased George Turnbull, and as an individual': Remits the cause to the Sheriff-substitute for further procedure, &c."*

LORD SHAND.—I concur with your Lordship. I think that the power of amendment which is allowed by statute both in this Court and in the Sheriff Court should receive a very liberal construction. In practice it has received such a construction, and accordingly it has in many cases saved the necessity of bringing a new action. But the present proposal would carry the power of amendment too far. The pursuer had not the character of executrix to her deceased husband when the action was brought. The action as brought was stamped with the character of a personal action, i.e., an action at the instance of the pursuer herself as an individual. It could not in any sense be held to be at her instance as executrix. The proposal is that some time after the action was brought, having been appointed executrix to her deceased husband, she should, under the 24th section of the Sheriff Court Act of 1876, be entitled to prosecute her action in this new character. I think the Sheriff is plainly right in holding that this is inadmissible. It is enough for the decision of the case that the title of executrix was obtained after the action at the instance of the pursuer, as an individual, was in Court.

LORD ADAM.—I think this is an attempt to introduce a new pursuer, for which there is no warrant in the 24th section of the Sheriff Court Act.

The bank's agent communicated this condition to the holders, and without waiting for authority took payment of the bill and protest charges, marked the bill paid, and delivered it to the acceptors, who deleted their names thereon. Thereafter the holders intimated their refusal to agree to the condition on which payment had been made, refused to accept the sum tendered to them by the agent of the bank, and received back the bill cancelled. They then raised an action against the acceptors for the amount of the bill, with interest, and for the expenses of the action, and obtained decree, but the estates of the acceptors became bankrupt before diligence could be used against them.

The National Bank presented the bill for payment on 7th May 1887 at the Bank of Scotland in London, but payment was refused in consequence of a dispute between Messrs Anderson and the M'Arthur Brothers in reference to the state of the cargo of timber on its arrival. The bill was then protested for non-payment.

The dispute having been settled, Mr Mackenzie, the agent for the Bank of Scotland, at Grangemouth, on 21st May 1887, wrote to the National Bank of Scotland in London:—"With reference to my letter of 16th inst., if the bill p. £2939, 9s. 6d. be sent on here for collection, it will in all likelihood be paid, but not the expenses, as the fault was not on Messrs W. Anderson & Company's side—at least so they say."

On 28th May following the Messrs Anderson wrote to Mr Mackenzie:—"Confirming our former instructions to you, it just now occurs to us that immediate payment might be made provided that the National Bank, London, gave a guarantee to hand over the bill to you on its return, and hold us scatheless in event of its miscarriage in any way whatever, also freeing us of all expenses and interest. On hearing you have received such guarantee, we will instruct you to pay."

That letter was on the day of receipt forwarded to the National Bank, London.

On 7th June the National Bank, London, wrote to Mr Mackenzie:—"Referring to your letter of 21st ulto., we now enclose for collection and remittance through your London office (bill being accepted payable in London) Anderson, £2939, 9s. 6d. Should the acceptors decline to pay protest charges, 12s. 6d., please return protest to us. Acceptors will of course pay the remitting charge.

"We presented the bill to-day at your London office, but they state that they are still without instructions regarding it."

On 9th June Messrs Anderson wrote to Mr Mackenzie:—"We have yours stating the National Bank, London, will take payment of this bill, but we would like you to get a letter from them freeing us of interest and expenses as asked in ours of 28th ulto. The way we have been treated in the past is our excuse for being somewhat particular now."

That letter was enclosed by Mr Mackenzie to the National Bank in the following letter, also dated 9th June:—"With reference to your letter of 7th inst., I enclose herewith a communication received from W. Anderson & Company, from which you will observe that they would pay the 12s. 6d., together with the remitting charge, re the bill, on condition that they were held free of further responsibility. Please favour me with your instructions.

"P.S.—As Mr Anderson is presently living at Callander, and may not be here till Monday morning, we retain the bill till that day if we have not contrary instructions from you."

On 13th June Mr Mackenzie took payment from the acceptors of the amount of the bill, with 12s. 6d. of charges, and delivered up to them the bill, which was cancelled by perforation of the word 'paid.' Subsequently, on the same day Mr Mackenzie sent a draft for the amount of the bill and charges to the National Bank in London, enclosed in this letter:—"I beg to enclose draft for £2940, 2s., being amount of W. Anderson & Company's acceptance referred to in your letter of 7th inst., with 12s. 6d. of protest charges.

"Of course you distinctly understand, in accordance with Messrs Anderson & Company's letter herewith enclosed, that so far as that firm is concerned the draft is accepted by you in settlement of the transaction without any reservation."

No. 187.
July 19, 1889.
Dominion
Bank v. Bank
of Scotland.

Messrs Anderson's letter, which was enclosed, was as follows:—"Confirming our former respects, we hand you payment of this bill on the distinct understanding that we are freed from all responsibility for interest, expenses, &c."

On 18th June the National Bank, having got instructions from the Dominion Bank, wrote to Mr Mackenzie:—"As our friends have not authorised us to take payment of the acceptance on the conditions tendered, we return your draft £2940, 2s., and shall thank you to send us the bill, with protest attached." Mr Mackenzie then received back the bill from Messrs Anderson, and repaid the sum which had been paid to him. When he received the bill, it was found that the Messrs Anderson had deleted their names thereon as acceptors.

The Dominion Bank thereupon raised an action against the Messrs Anderson on 12th July 1887, for the amount of the bill and charges, with interest, and decree was granted, with expenses, against the defenders on 10th February 1888 (see 15 R. 408).

Thereafter the Messrs Anderson were charged to pay under the decree, but failed to do so, and their estates were sequestrated on 15th March 1888.

On 11th June 1888 the Dominion Bank raised the present action against the Bank of Scotland, concluding for payment of the amount of the bill, with interest, and for the expenses of the action and diligence against the Messrs Anderson.

The pursuers averred, after reciting the facts above stated;—"In these circumstances, and in consequence of the defenders, or their agent at Grangemouth, for whom they are responsible, having wrongfully and without the authority of the pursuers, delivered up the foresaid bill to the acceptors, and cancelled it in the manner before mentioned, and in consequence of the delay thereby caused, and proceedings which were rendered necessary by the defenders' fault and negligence, the pursuers have sustained loss and damage to the extent of the sum in the said bill, and interest due thereon, and expenses, all as sued for in the first conclusion, or otherwise to the extent of the sum sued for in the alternative conclusion."

The defenders answered;—"Denied, and explained that any loss which the pursuers may have sustained was caused by their own actings or that of their agents, the National Bank, London."

The pursuers pleaded;—(1) The pursuers having, by the defenders' breach of duty and wrongful conduct, sustained loss, all as condescended on, the pursuers are entitled to decree in terms of one or other of the alternative conclusions of the summons. (2) The pursuers having, by the defenders' fault, suffered loss and damage to the amount concluded for, they are entitled to decree therefor.

The defenders pleaded, inter alia;—(2) There having been no fault on the part of the defenders, they ought to be assoilzied. (3) The loss, if any, to which the pursuers have been subjected, having been due to the actings of their own agents in London, the defenders should be assoilzied.

In a proof evidence was led, inter alia, on the question whether if it had been possible for the Dominion Bank to charge Messrs Anderson on the cancelled bill in July 1887, the latter were then solvent, and could have paid the amount.*

* On this point Mr Horsbrugh, trustee in the Messrs Anderson's sequestration, deponed,—"I have declared a dividend of 1s. per £ on the estate, and paid

On 28th November 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Fraser) decerned against the defenders for the amount of the bill, with interest from 7th May 1887, and for the amount of the expenses of the former action, under deduction it. The amount paid on the Dominion Bank's claim is £161, 0s. 3d. It was paid to the National Bank of Scotland on 20th September 1888. I expect the estate will yield a further dividend of about 6d. per £. To the best of my judgment, that will be all the estate will yield. I have had all the papers and business books of the bankrupts put before me. From June 1887 to the date of their sequestration they were carrying on their business in the way they had been doing it for some time. They appear to have met their current bills as they became due. Between the dates I have mentioned they met bills to the amount of £10,195, exclusive of the one in question. They were met and paid at their due dates. The bankrupts were also paying freights and other liabilities during the same period. They paid freights to the amount of £1406, besides other debts. I find Mr Anderson did a considerable amount of business in discounting bills for other people, but excluding these, I am of opinion that in order to meet his own bills, and make payments in connection with his own business, he must have paid between 13th June 1887 and the date of sequestration over £18,000.

"Cross.—I endeavoured to ascertain where he got the money, and I find he discounted bills of other people with different banks to the amount of about £12,000, that he collected book debts to the amount of £5000 or £6000, and he got in other sums making up just about £18,000. The difficulty I had was to distinguish what were his bills and what were other people's. At 25th June 1887 he was due the Bank of Scotland £344, and the Clydesdale Bank £3613—together £3958, and there was due to him by the Union Bank £5, 19s. 7d., so that his total indebtedness to his three bankers was £3952. The book debts were ordinary trade debts due to him by parties to whom he actually sold timber. Those parties were mostly in Scotland, I understand. The draft in question was applied as follows:—Lodged on deposit-receipt, in name of Mr Anderson's son, £2846, 11s. 5d., sent to Mr Anderson's law-agents £95—together £2941, the sum which he got back. The deposit-receipt stood in the son's name until 4th July. It was then uplifted and applied thus. In payment in cash to Dow & Company to enable them to retire some bills on 4th July, £862; in retiring bills of his own firm, £298, 12s. 7d.; and paid into current account of his firm with the Clydesdale Bank £1685. The £862 paid to Dow & Company was to enable them to retire bills on which they were ostensibly the primary debtors; there were cross bills. The deposit-receipts were with the Bank of Scotland, I think, but I can hardly state distinctly.

"Re-examined.—Dow & Company and Anderson & Company were, I think, accommodating each other with their names. I think the bills could be traced to their ultimate liability."

Mr Spens, writer, Glasgow, agent for the pursuers in the action at the instance of the Dominion Bank against Messrs Anderson, deponed,—“I had charge of the former litigation in regard to this bill. The bill was placed in our hands first, I think, on 6th July 1887. I went to Messrs Carruthers & Gemmell, Anderson & Company's agents, and proposed that they should pay the amount of the principal, and that all questions as to interest and charges should be reserved. They said they would see their client on the subject, and no answer coming, I wrote them, stating that I had instructed proceedings to be taken. This was on 11th July. When I was first consulted, I asked the bill to be sent so that I might do summary diligence, but when I found it was cancelled, and that I could not do summary diligence, I instructed an ordinary action. Cross.—My impression is that we put warrants of arrestment in the summons in the action against Anderson; I am satisfied that we arrested in the hands of the Bank of Scotland. At that time Anderson & Company, I believe, were engaged in considerable trade. (Q.) Did you try to find any other money? [Objected to; objection repelled.] (A.) I did—I mean I made inquiries with reference to whether I could get money due to Anderson, and I was informed I could not. I did not get anything by arrestment in the hands of the Bank of Scotland.”

Dominion
of Scotland.

* "OPINION.—This is an action of damages brought by the Dominion Bank, Toronto, against the Bank of Scotland, by reason of the latter having failed to collect the contents of a bill which was intrusted to them for that purpose. The bill was drawn by the M'Arthur Brothers, Limited, of Toronto, upon and accepted by William Anderson & Company, merchants, Grangemouth, for £2939, 9s. 6d., and dated 28th September 1886. It was made payable at the Bank of Scotland, London, at 180 days' sight from 5th November 1886, and therefore was due on 7th May 1887. It was indorsed by the drawers to the Dominion Bank, Toronto, and they are now the holders of it for value. The Dominion Bank sent the bill to the National Bank of Scotland, London, for collection, and the latter bank presented it for payment at the Bank of Scotland in London, when payment was refused, and protest taken. The agent for the defenders at Grangemouth did the banking business for the drawees, William Anderson & Company, and, hearing of the presentment of the bill for payment at the defenders' London branch, wrote on the 16th of May 1887 a letter to the National Bank of Scotland, London, in the following terms:—'An acceptance of Messrs William Anderson & Company, of this town, p. £2939, 9s. 6d., was presented at our London office, and payment refused on account of there being a dispute between the merchants who drew the bill and themselves. If the matter be now adjusted you might send forward the document for collection.' That is to say, the defenders, through their agent, intimated to the pursuers that they would collect the money. In the meantime, however, and before this letter was received in London, the pursuers had returned the bill to Toronto, in order to preserve recourse against the indorsers, and intimated this; but it was added that 'if you remit us the amount and charges we shall have pleasure in recalling the bill by cablegram.' The history of what followed will be found in the opinion of the Lord President in the case of The Dominion Bank v. Anderson & Company (10th February 1888, 15 Rettie, 414), and it is unnecessary to do more in the way of narrative than to refer to that opinion. It was held in that case that by reason of the mistake (or the acting without authority) of Mr Mackenzie, the agent for the defenders at Grangemouth, the signature to the bill was cancelled and the bill marked paid. The result of this was, that although the pursuers obtained re-delivery of the bill (which had been sent on to the defenders' branch at Grangemouth), summary diligence could not be done upon it because ex facie it was cancelled. An ordinary action was rendered necessary at the instance of the pursuers against Anderson & Company, in which the latter firm pleaded that they could not be sued upon the bill because of the cancellation, while at the same time they had got possession of the timber for which the bill had been granted without paying for it. Shortly after decree was obtained in this action, Anderson & Company became bankrupt.

"Now, it is proved that, if due diligence had been shewn by Mackenzie, the defenders' agent, the bill would have been retired by Anderson & Company. Mr Horsbrugh, the trustee in their sequestration, which took place on 15th March 1888, proves that between 13th June 1887, when the bill was cancelled, and the date of sequestration in March 1888, Anderson & Company were carrying on business to a large amount, and paid away to merchants with whom they dealt over £18,000. The money which had been sent to London in payment of the bill, and which was returned to Grangemouth, was lodged in bank on deposit-receipt in name of Anderson's son to the amount of £2846, 11s. 5d., where it remained until the 4th of July, when it was uplifted, and applied by Anderson & Company to other purposes.

"A proof was led in the present action, and Mr Mackenzie was again examined as a witness. He repeated his former evidence with one unimportant variation, and gave his construction of the letters which passed between him and the National Bank in London, in the same way in which he gave it in the former action, and in regard to which the Court held him to be quite wrong. He justified now, as he justified before, the delivering up of the bill for cancellation;

No. 187. The defenders reclaimed, and argued;—The meaning of the letter of 7th June 1887 was—give up the bill if you get the money for it—and payment was taken on that letter alone. It was not proved that any damage had been incurred by the pursuers by the cancellation of the bill; all that they lost thereby was the right to do summary diligence thereon.

but there was nothing new, either in his evidence, or in the evidence of other two witnesses, to alter the opinion given effect to by the judgment of the Court,—that he acted without authority. The variation from his former evidence consisted in this, that whereas he formerly said, ‘If I had known that the bank did not agree to the conditions expressed in the letter of 9th, I would certainly not have given up the bill.’ But now he says in answer to the question, ‘If you had known that the bank did not agree to the conditions expressed in your and Mr Anderson’s letters of 9th June, would you have given up the bill, in exchange for the payment that you got,’ he answers, ‘On the 13th, certainly.’ And he states that he was misreported on the former occasion, and now says that he would have delivered up the bill to Anderson & Company to be cancelled on the 13th of June, although he had known that the bank did not agree to the conditions expressed in Anderson & Company’s letter of the 9th. This is a strange statement to make, coming from an agent whose duty it was to collect a sum of money, and who took payment upon conditions that he knew his principals had not agreed to.

“According to the evidence of Mr Horsbrugh, the sequestrated estate of Anderson & Company will not yield more than 1s. 6d. in the £—1s. per £ of this dividend has been paid, and the remaining 6d., it is anticipated, may be soon obtained. Thus the Dominion Bank have obtained very little benefit from the decree against Anderson & Company, and they now make their claim against the Bank of Scotland on account of the laches of that bank’s agent. No defence is here stated to the effect that Mr Mackenzie, in what he did, did not represent the defenders. But the defence, as stated by their counsel, consisted of three parts—first, that there was no contract of agency proved. This is clearly negatived by the letters which have been produced, the analysis of which has been given by the Lord President, and the conclusion come to is thus stated in his opinion:—‘From that time (7th June) I apprehend that Mackenzie was acting for both parties. He did not give up the position of acting for the acceptors, but he undertook the additional duty of collecting for the National Bank, and in that character he goes on to correspond with the National Bank.’

“In the next place, it is said that although there might be a breach of duty, the damages should be nominal, because the pursuers may have their recourse against the indorsers who are proved by a witness adduced for the defenders (Malcolm Carswell, a timber broker in Glasgow) to be persons in solvent circumstances. This is no good answer for the defenders’ breach of duty. Whether a good claim could now be made against the indorsers will depend upon the view taken by a Canadian Court as to whether recourse against them has not been lost, and the pursuers stated that they were quite willing to assign over to the defenders any claim that they may have against the drawers and indorsers.

“It is next said that in any view the damages claimable must be limited to the interest upon the bill from the time at which it fell due, a defence founded upon this, that the pursuers, having got hold of the money when it was sent up to them in London, ought to have kept it, and not returned it to Grangemouth. This defence, however, overlooks the fact that the money was sent up under a strict condition that no expenses or other charges for telegrams or commission should be exacted from Anderson & Company. If the money had been kept, it must have been kept under that condition, which was the subject of controversy between the parties, and which condition the pursuers had rejected. The result of the whole matter is that the defenders must be found liable in the loss which the pursuers have sustained. It is proved that if Mackenzie had done his duty payment would have been obtained in the month of June. The amount of this damage consists of the principal sum in the bill and interest thereon, and of the expenses incurred to the pursuers in the former action. . . .”

It had not been shewn that they could not recover from the indorsers, No. 187. and until that had been shewn by taking action against them, the pursuers had not exhausted their remedy, as they were bound to do before proceeding against the Bank of Scotland.<sup>1</sup> In point of fact, the indorsers were perfectly solvent. But if there was liability on the defenders, it was only to the extent of the loss actually shewn to be due to their actings, and they were therefore not liable in the whole amount of the bill with interest and expenses. The pursuers must prove the actual extent of the loss.<sup>2</sup> At all events, the liability must be limited to interest and expenses, as the National Bank should not have parted with the draft which they received in payment of the bill.

July 19, 1889.
Dominion
Bank v. Bank
of Scotland.

The respondents argued;—The conditions under which payment was made rendered it impossible for the National Bank to retain the draft. Mr Mackenzie was agent for the defenders, and they were responsible for his actings.<sup>3</sup> He had no authority to cancel the bill, and if he had not done so, the pursuers could at once have used summary diligence on it, and recovered the amount from the acceptors. The pursuers were not bound to proceed at once against the acceptors,<sup>4</sup> but were entitled to proceed against the person through whose fault the loss was incurred. The case was analogous to those in which claims were made against messengers-at-arms<sup>5</sup> and law-agents<sup>6</sup> for loss incurred through their fault. In the latter class of cases where the action was for loss through investments made by agents, the Court had found the agents liable, but assigned to them the security. The evidence shewed plainly that the acceptors would have been able to pay had the pursuers been able to do summary diligence in July 1887.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—The history of the bill which is the subject of the present action is pretty well known to us from the inquiry in the previous case of The Dominion Bank v. Anderson & Company, who were the acceptors of the bill, and it is not necessary to detain the Court over these circumstances for the decision of the present case.

There is no doubt that Mr Mackenzie, the agent for the defenders at Grange-mouth, became the agent of the Dominion Bank in collecting this bill, and it is not alleged that he was acting beyond his powers as the agent of the defenders, the Bank of Scotland. On the contrary, they accept the responsibility for what he did.

The bill had been protested for non-payment, and the reason of the non-payment seems to have been some dispute as to the quality of the cargo for which it had been granted. After the failure to pay, the bill was sent out to Canada in order to secure recourse against the drawers, and in these circumstances Mr Mackenzie came forward and offered to collect the bill for the National Bank, who are the agents in this country of the Dominion Bank of Canada. The bill was accordingly brought back to this country, and sent to Mackenzie at Grangemouth, who wrote to the National Bank of London a letter on 9th June, in which he says,—“With reference to your letter of 7th inst., I enclose herewith a communication received from W. Anderson & Company, from which you will observe that they would pay the 12s. 6d., together with the remitting charge re the bill, on condition that they were held free of further responsibility.” And the enclosed letter was in these terms,—“We have yours stating the National Bank, London, will take payment of this bill, but we would like to get a letter from them freeing us of interest and expenses as asked in ours of 28th ulto.”

The question therefore between the parties at that stage was whether Anderson & Company were liable for interest and expenses in consequence of non-payment of the bill on presentation, or were to be relieved of that charge. Everything else seems to have been arranged.

Now, the National Bank were acting merely as agents for the pursuers, and they communicated with them as to the conditions contained in the letter of Anderson & Company, and replied that they were not authorised to take payment upon these conditions. Mackenzie in the meantime, without waiting for an answer to his letter of the 9th June, and with no authority for so doing, took payment for the bill under deduction of the charges for interest and expenses, except the 12s. 6d. for protest charges, and having so taken payment he marked the bill as paid, and delivered it over to the acceptors. The question then arose whether the National Bank would take payment of the amount of the bill under deduction of interest and expenses, and they adhered to the instructions which they had received from the pursuers, and declined to do so.

Now, this was very awkward, and involved a serious responsibility on Mackenzie's part in acting as he did. He had sent on 13th June to the National Bank a draft of the amount paid by Anderson & Company, but accompanied by a letter to this effect,—“Of course you distinctly understand . . . that . . . the draft is accepted by you in settlement of the transaction without any reservation.” The National Bank, acting on the instruction of the pursuers, were forced to return the draft, saying that they could not take it on that condition, and in so doing they acted quite rightly. The money accordingly was sent back and handed over to the acceptors, but the bill was cancelled, and a great difficulty arose in obtaining payment of it, and indeed it might have been impossible to do so if it had not been for the provision of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, sec. 63, subsec. (3), which enacts that “a cancellation made unintentionally, or under a mistake, or without the authority of the holder, is inoperative, but where a bill or any signature thereon appears to have been cancelled, the burden of proof lies on the party who alleges that the cancellation was made unintentionally, or under a mistake, or without authority.” The position of the pursuers and their agents accordingly was that while they could not charge on the bill, they were enabled to raise an action to recover the amount of the bill, founding on the above section of the Bills of Exchange Act, and proving that it was cancelled without authority. The pursuers were successful decree could be put in force against the acceptors they had become bankrupt—Dominion that is, in March following. Bank v. Bank of Scotland.

The present action is brought against the Bank of Scotland to recover the loss sustained by the pursuers by reason of the cancellation of the bill. The Lord Ordinary has found the Bank of Scotland liable on the ground, as I understand his Lordship, that owing to the cancellation of the bill, which was unauthorised and improper, the pursuers, the holders, were unable to charge upon it, and that if they had been able to give a charge at the date of the action against Anderson & Company there is no doubt that they would have recovered payment, the bill being liable to no objection on the face of it till it was cancelled. If any dispute had arisen as to the sum due under it, and the acceptors had brought a suspension of the charge, there is just as little doubt that the bill of suspension would not have been passed without consignation, and so the pursuers would have been safe, because at that time it is not disputed that the acceptors' business was perfectly sound and able to meet its liabilities. That seems to me a good ground of decision, and I agree with his Lordship. The damage sustained by the Dominion Bank resulted from the wrongful act of Mackenzie, the agent for the Bank of Scotland, and therefore the Bank of Scotland is liable, and I hold that the question of their liability is not affected by the fact that other parties may be liable against whom the pursuers may have recourse, namely, the drawers, M'Arthur Brothers. We do not know much about the question whether recourse has been preserved against them, or whether they may or may not be good for the money. In the meantime the loss has been incurred directly from the fault of the defenders or their agent, and I do not think it is a good answer to the pursuers' claim that possibly they may recover from someone else. The rule of law rather is that when by the fault of a party a document of debt has been rendered inoperative or ineffectual the party in fault is liable to make good the loss thereby incurred, and cannot say to the loser that he may recover from someone else. On the other hand, I am disposed to say that the Bank of Scotland may have an equitable right to an assignation to enable them to proceed against the drawers.

LORD MURE.—When the first question raised with reference to this bill came before the Court in the action against the acceptors, I concurred with your Lordship in holding that the arrangement come to between the agent for the present defenders at Grangemouth and the acceptors relative to the payment of the bill, and under which it was given up to the acceptors and cancelled by them, had resulted in a cancellation which was made by mistake, and without the authority of the holder of the bill, in the sense of the 63d section of the Act 45 and 46 Vict. c. 61, and that the bill was therefore one on which the acceptors were still liable to be proceeded against. In that action decree was pronounced against the acceptors, who were charged on the decree. They, however, failed to pay the bill, and having thereafter been sequestrated a dividend of 1s. in the pound has been declared on the estate; and it seems to be expected that an additional dividend of 6d. in the pound at most may be paid.

In these circumstances the present action has been brought against the defenders for payment of the bill, on the ground that the pursuers had failed to obtain payment of it through the fault of the defenders' agent at Grangemouth. The fault is said to have consisted in this: That the agent accepted payment of the bill on conditions which the pursuers had not authorised, and were not bound to accede to, and then gave up the bill to the acceptors, who cancelled their signature, and thereby prevented the pursuers from doing summary diligence on the bill. The action is therefore not only substantially but expressly one of damages for loss said to have been caused by the defenders; and it is distinctly alleged in the record (cond. 12) that in consequence of the delay which resulted from the pursuers being obliged to have recourse to an ordinary action instead of summary diligence, and from proceedings "which were thus rendered necessary by the defenders' fault and negligence, the pursuers have sustained loss and damage to the extent of the sum in the bill, and interest thereon," as sued for in the summons.

The Lord Ordinary has given effect to this contention, and decreed against the defenders for payment of the bill and interest, and for a further sum as the balance of an account of expenses brought out after crediting the defenders with the dividend received from the acceptors' estate.

I am of opinion with the Lord Ordinary that if it could be proved that the loss and damage here claimed were occasioned through the delay which occurred in taking proceedings upon the bill, and, in particular, in consequence of the pursuers having been prevented from doing summary diligence, owing to the bill having been cancelled with the knowledge and permission of the defenders' agent at Grangemouth, the damage would be of a description for which the defenders would be liable in law. But after repeated consideration of the evidence, I have been unable, the onus being, as I conceive, upon the pursuers to prove their case as laid in the record, to come to the conclusion, in the circumstances of this case, that if the pursuers had been able to do summary diligence at the time they resolved to proceed against the acceptors in July 1887 they would have succeeded in recovering the amount of the bill.

In dealing with this matter, the time at which the pursuers gave instructions that proceedings should be taken is of importance. As I read the evidence, that was not till the beginning of July 1887, as shewn by the letter from the National Bank, London, of the 5th of July of that year, and by the evidence of Mr Spens, one of the firm to whom that letter was addressed, who says,—“The bill was placed in our hands on the 6th of July 1887. When I was first consulted, I asked the bill to be sent that I might do summary diligence, but when I found it was cancelled I instructed an ordinary action.” The main question therefore to be considered upon the evidence under the present action is, whether the pursuers have proved that they failed to obtain payment of the bill in consequence of the delay occasioned by their having recourse to an ordinary action against the acceptors, instead of proceeding by summary diligence; and this I apprehend they must do by some clear and distinct direct evidence, and not by mere presumptions or inferences to be deduced from the circumstances of the case, even if these presumptions were in their favour.

Having regard, however, to the fact that the acceptors' estate did not admit of more than a dividend of 1s. 6d. in the £ in March 1888, the presumptions are, I think, much against the probability of the acceptors being able, under a six days' charge, to meet a demand for about £3000, if they had been charged for payment at the time Mr Spens received instructions to proceed, and the evidence, as I read it, tends to strengthen these presumptions. Mr Spens is questioned on the subject of arrestments on the dependence, and he says,—“My impression is that we put warrants of arrestment in the summons in the action against Anderson. I am satisfied that we arrested in the hands of the Bank of Scotland. At that time Anderson & Company, I believe, were engaged in considerable trade. Did you try to find any other money?—I did; I mean I made inquiries with reference to whether I could get money due to Anderson, and I was informed I could not. I did not get anything by arrestment in the hands of the Bank of Scotland.”

No. 187.

Dominion
Bank v. Bank
of Scotland.

Mr Horsburgh, the trustee on the sequestrated estate is also examined, and he says that at the 25th of June 1887 the bankrupts were due to their three bankers about £3950; and with reference to the money which had been remitted to London to pay the bill, but returned, he says—“The draft in question was applied as follows—Lodged on deposit-receipt in name of Mr Anderson's son, £2846, 11s. 5d.; sent to Mr Anderson's law-agents, £95—together, £2941, the sum which he got back. The deposit-receipt stood in the son's name until 4th July. It was then uplifted, and applied thus—In payment in cash to Dow & Company to enable them to retire some bills on 4th July, £862; in retiring bills of his own firm, £298, 12s. 7d.; and paid into current account of his firm with the Clydesdale Bank, £1685. The £862 paid to Dow & Company was to enable them to retire bills on which they were ostensibly the primary debtors. There were cross-bills. The deposit-receipts were with the Bank of Scotland, I think, but I can hardly state distinctly. Dow & Company and Anderson & Company were, I think, accommodating each other with their names.”

There being therefore, according to this evidence, no money to be heard of that could be secured by arrestment when Mr Spens was instructed to proceed against the acceptors, and a large sum due to the banks with whom the acceptors dealt, it is difficult to see where the money was to come from which would have been required to meet a charge on summary diligence for so large a sum on or after the 6th of July 1887. There is plainly no direct evidence either that there was or that there would have been any such sum available to pay the bill.

All therefore that the pursuers would have got by using summary diligence would have been a warrant to poind the acceptors' goods and effects. But there is no evidence as to what those goods and effects were, or as to what might be their value. And it must be borne in mind that it is no longer competent to imprison for non-payment of a civil debt; so that summary diligence as a means of enforcing payment of a civil debt has lost what was formerly its chief compulsitor. It is now substantially nothing more than a warrant to poind and arrest. But it is proved that there was no money to arrest, and it is not proved that there was anything to poind. Had there been funds which could have been attached by arrestment or effects which admitted of being poinded in July 1887, these facts might, as I conceive, have been proved by Anderson and his son. But neither of these parties were examined by the pursuers, who have thus failed to clear up a matter which, in the view I take of it, was of great importance in the case, and should have been cleared up to entitle the pursuers to recover under the present action.

 of Scotland.

Does the fact, then, spoken to by Mr Horsbrugh, of the bankrupts' firm having from time to time made payments to the amount of £18,000 in connection with their business between the month of June 1887 and the date of their bankruptcy, being at the rate of about £2000 a-month, lead necessarily to the inference that if summary diligence, as it is now restricted, had been used the bill would have been paid? I have not been able to see my way to that conclusion. It is plain, I think, from Mr Horsbrugh's evidence that a good deal of the business of the firm was carried on by means of cross and accommodation bills, and there is no evidence to shew that they were at any time possessed of any realised capital. The money which had been returned from London, and deposited in the bank, had all been drawn out by the 4th of July, and applied in payment of other debts, and it does not appear from Mr Horsbrugh's statement that the firm ever had any money at their credit in the bank after that date. And that being so, my strong impression upon the evidence as it stands is, that if the pursuers had been in a position to proceed by summary diligence on the 6th of July 1887, instead of by ordinary action, and had done so on a bill of so large an amount, the same result would in all probability have followed as that which followed the charge given in 1888, viz., the sequestration of the acceptors' firm, and the offer of a small dividend to the creditors. For the acceptors do not appear to have been parties who had any large amount of funds at their command. The bill in question was due on the 7th of May, but had been dishonoured and protested for non-payment, and sent out to Canada by the pursuers' agent in this country for instructions, from whence it was not returned till towards the middle of June, and it was not till then that the acceptors appear to have been able to get together money enough to meet the bill, and to make the conditional offer of payment which was refused.

In these circumstances I am unable to arrive at the conclusion that the pursuers have proved that the loss sustained was caused by the cancellation of the bill, and their consequent inability to proceed by summary diligence. On the evidence as it stands the loss arose from the inability of the acceptors to pay their ordinary debts; and the pursuers have not in my opinion proved, as they undertook to do, that the acceptors would have been able to pay the bill had they been charged to do so on or after the 6th of July 1887, or that the amount of the bill would then have been recovered under a warrant to poind and arrest, which is all they would have got under summary diligence, as that remedy is now restricted under the operation of the Act abolishing imprisonment for debt.

I am therefore of opinion that the interlocutor of the Lord Ordinary should be recalled, and the defenders assoilzied from the conclusions of the action.

LORD SHAND.—This case is one of very considerable hardship to the defenders, because it is contended that they are liable for a bill for nearly £3000, with which originally they had no connection except as collectors, and from which they could have obtained scarcely any profit. At the same time, I agree with your Lordships that responsibility for the amount of the bill attaches to the Bank of Scotland; for I cannot agree with Lord Mure that it is not proved that the pursuers have sustained loss owing to the cancellation of the bill.

The Dominion Bank being the holders of the bill, and having sent it to London to the National Bank for collection, it was presented at the place of payment and dishonoured. The National Bank then returned it to Canada that the pursuers might take recourse against the drawers. When the bill was on its way out, Mackenzie, an agent of the defenders' bank at Grangemouth, intimated that if it were still in this country the bill would be paid. The National Bank on getting this intimation telegraphed for the bill, and having received it on 7th June 1887 they sent definite instructions to the Bank of Scotland with reference to the collection of the contents of the bill in these terms:—"Referring to your letter of 21st ulto., we now enclose for collection and remittance through your London office (bill being accepted payable in London) Anderson, £2939, 9s. 6d. Should the acceptors decline to pay protest charges, please return protest to us. Acceptors will of course pay the remitting charge." That was an authority to the Bank of Scotland to give up the bill only on obtaining payment of the sum mentioned, 12s. 6d. of protest charges, and the remitting charge. On the 25th of June the National Bank got the bill back again, but not in the same state in which it was sent. In the meantime the acceptors' names had been deleted, and it had been perforated as "paid" with the Bank of Scotland's usual mark.

July 19, 1889.
 Bank v. Bank
 of Scotland.

Now, what had occurred was this: The acceptors being in funds to meet the bill, paid the amount to the Bank of Scotland. They remitted it to London by draft, and if the remittance had not been clogged with a condition there would have been an end of the transaction, as the National Bank would have got all it stipulated for. But Mr Mackenzie in sending the draft did so subject to a condition expressed as follows:—"Of course you distinctly understand, in accordance with Messrs Anderson & Company's letter herewith enclosed, that so far as that firm is concerned, the draft is accepted by you in settlement of the transaction without any reservation." The letter enclosed was in these terms:—"Confirming our former respects, we hand you payment of this bill on the distinct understanding that we are freed from all responsibility for interest, expenses," &c. An indefinite amount of interest had run on the bill, and the National Bank had no authority to give up the Dominion Bank's claim for interest and expenses. They were quite willing to take the draft, but not to undertake to abandon their claim for interest and expenses. Accordingly they returned the draft rejecting the conditions and requiring the bill to be sent. When the bill arrived it had been cancelled, because the Bank of Scotland had given up the bill under the arrangement that the acceptors should be free of all further claims.

I think it is clear, that as the bill was cancelled in the way I have explained, there is liability on the part of the bank for the consequences. As to the amount of the liability I confess I have no doubt that it was the legal right of the Dominion Bank to get the bill back as it was sent, and as it was sent back mutilated I think they were entitled to return it, and refuse to take it as a document of debt which, in its altered and mutilated state, was liable to most serious objection. The pursuers might have taken that course. They appeared anxious, however, to avoid inflicting loss upon the Bank of Scotland, who were making scarcely any profit by the transaction, and who had interfered with the view of helping their correspondents, the National Bank. The vital fact is that had the bill not been cancelled proceedings might have been taken to enforce payment by summary diligence founded on the bill, and the charge would have expired by 4th July 1887, and it appears to me the holders would

No. 187. have had no difficulty in getting their money. It appears from the letters of the agents printed in the case that they considered the question whether they could do summary diligence on the bill, and came to the conclusion that they could not. If they could have done summary diligence they would have obtained payment or consignment of the sum due on the bill, as the acceptors had no answer on the merits, and could only have litigated the case by consigning the money. The agents of the pursuers having been advised that they could not do summary diligence had then to get instructions from Canada, and so early as 12th July an action was raised and litigated on the ground that the bill had been improperly cancelled. Within a month of decree being obtained the acceptors were bankrupt. It appears from the correspondence that the agents of the pursuers intimated to the Bank of Scotland all that they were doing, who could have said that they would take the responsibility upon themselves, but, on the contrary, they allowed the Dominion Bank to go on.

July 19, 1889.
Bank v. Bank
of Scotland.

As regards the liability of the defenders, is it not proved that damage was sustained? In the first place, my opinion is that the onus would lie on the Bank of Scotland of proving that no damage was sustained owing to their action. I think the Dominion Bank would have been entitled to say,—“Take and keep the bill, and pay us the amount of it.” But, however the question as to onus might be, there has been a proof in the case. I think that but for the cancellation summary diligence could have been done on the bill early in July 1887. The position of the acceptors at that time was that they were carrying on business as usual. They had remitted a draft for the amount to London, and had the sum lying in bank, and finding that the matter was not arranged, they uplifted the amount in July. The evidence all points clearly to this, that if a charge had been made on the bill in July the money would have been either consigned or secured. Time went on, and in March 1888 the acceptors were sequestered. What is the evidence as to the intervening period? We find from the evidence of Mr Horsburgh, the trustee in the sequestration, that “they were carrying on their business in the way they had been doing it for some time. They appear to have met their current bills when they became due. Between the dates I have mentioned they met bills to the amount of £10,195, exclusive of the one in question. They were met and paid at their due dates. The bankrupts were also paying freights and other liabilities during the same period. They paid freights to the amount of £1406, besides other debts.” The acceptors had a going business, and surely it is to be presumed in that state of matters that the charge would have produced money. And although it appears also that the pursuers made inquiry about getting funds to arrest, and found that the Andersons had an overdraft at the bank, I think there is no reason to infer that they would not have got payment.

On the whole case, I think the onus was on the Bank of Scotland to shew that in July 1887 the Andersons had no funds to meet the bill, and that the proof has shewn that there were funds, and further, I think that the Bank of Scotland should have called Anderson as a witness in order to discharge the onus upon them. And so I agree in holding that the defenders are liable. I concur also in the view that the pursuers are not bound to go on and adopt further procedure against the drawers, who seem to have an unanswerable objection to a demand for payment of the bill if presented in its present state.

LORD ADAM.—I am disposed to think that the Dominion Bank would have been within its right to have refused to take the cancelled bill and to have claimed the full amount from the Bank of Scotland, leaving the Bank of Scotland to recover the amount of the bill. I rather think that would have been the proper course, and all questions would have been avoided as to what might have been recovered. There was, however, nothing wrong in the course which was followed, namely, to raise an action against the acceptors in their own names. I am clearly of opinion that it was impossible to charge the acceptors on the cancelled bill. Then if that be so, what followed? The litigation went on for a year, at the end of which time the acceptors became bankrupt. These facts, I think, shew, unless they are redargued, that the loss which the bank suffered by the cancellation of the bill, and their inability to charge upon it, was just the difference between the amount due on the bill and the dividend they have received from the acceptors' estate. There is, I think, no presumption after so long that the Dominion Bank would have been no more successful in securing payment at the date the bill was cancelled than a year after. No doubt it is quite relevant for the Bank of Scotland to aver and offer to prove that the Andersons were insolvent at that date, and that no loss resulted from the inability to charge on the bill. The onus is, I think, on the Bank of Scotland to prove that, and I am accordingly of opinion that if it is matter of doubt whether the Andersons were able to pay at the date of the cancellation, any evil which has resulted must fall on the Bank of Scotland.

If, then, I concurred with Lord Mure as to the doubtful nature of the evidence, I should still have held the Bank of Scotland liable. On the contrary, however, I agree with the Lord President and Lord Shand on the evidence in the case, that if the holders had been in a position to charge on the bill they would have recovered the amount due on the bill. And I also agree that if the loss has arisen from the cancellation of the bill, it is no answer to say that it is possible that some other persons might have been able to pay. The Bank of Scotland is on the other hand, I think, entitled to get an assignation to the bill, and to recover if it can.

THE COURT adhered.

HUGH MACLEAN of Westfield and Hythehill, Elgin, died on 8th April 1885, leaving a trust-disposition and settlement, in which he directed his trustees, after payment of debts and making provision for certain alimentary annuities, to pay over the free yearly income of the estate, both heritable and moveable, to his son, John Alexander Maclean, during all the days of his life.

In the eighth purpose of the deed Mr Maclean directed,—“After the death of the said John Alexander Maclean, my son, and within a period of twelve months after that event shall occur, if he shall leave lawful issue, I hereby direct my said trustees to dispone and convey my said lands and estates of Westfield, Inchshaggarty, and Inchbrock, particularly above described, and my dwelling-house at Hythehill, with offices and garden, and my plate and pictures, to the eldest son of the said John Alexander Maclean, and the lawful heirs of his body, whom failing, to the second son of the said John Alexander Maclean, and the lawful heirs of his body. . . . And in regard to the residue of my estate, if it should happen that the said John Alexander Maclean should leave more than one lawful child of his body, I hereby direct and appoint my trustees, after the lapse of twelve months from the death of the said John Alexander Maclean, to divide and apportion the said residue of my estate among the said children equally and share alike, the heir succeeding to the estates of Westfield, Inchshaggarty, and Inchbrock, being entitled to receive an equal share of the residue of my estate along with the other children.” In the ninth purpose he directed,—“In the event the said John Alexander Maclean should die without any lawful descendants of his body, then, and in that event, I hereby direct and appoint my said trustees, within twelve months after the death of the said John Alexander Maclean, or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit, after making due provision for all the annuities, legacies, and bequests herein contained or referred to, and for the complete fulfilment of this my deed of settlement, to dispone and convey my said lands and estate of Westfield, Inchshaggarty, and Inchbrock, specially above described, and my dwelling-house of Hythehill, offices, and garden, with my plate and pictures, to James Maclean, my nephew, son of the said James Maclean, my brother, and the lawful heirs of his body; whom failing, to George Maclean, my nephew, a younger son of the said James Maclean, my brother, and the lawful heirs of his body; whom also failing, to my nearest lawful heirs whomsoever; and with regard to the residue and remainder of my means and estate, I, in the event of my son dying without lawful descendants of his body, and within twelve months after that event, or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit, direct and appoint my said trustees to apportion and divide the said residue among the children of my said brother James Maclean equally and share and share alike, whom I hereby appoint to be my residuary legatees, declaring hereby that the member of the family succeeding to my said heritable estate of Westfield and others specially above described shall also be entitled to a share of the residue along with the others. And it is hereby provided that if any of the children of the said James Maclean should die before the period of division, leaving lawful descendants, such descendants shall be paid the share of the residue that would have fallen to their deceased parent if then in life; and it is hereby declared that the share of succession effeiring to said residuary legatees shall become vested interests in their persons at and only upon the period of payment above mentioned."

Maclean's
Trustees v.
Macleans.

John Alexander Maclean died without issue on 12th January 1888. James Maclean, the heir of provision, who was then in Ceylon, returned to this country in the beginning of April. The trust-estate, at that date, consisted of the farm of Westfield, in the occupation of a tenant holding under lease, granted by the trustees, for nineteen years from Whitsunday 1886, at a rent of £330, and the farms of Surradale and Orchardfield in the natural occupation of the trustees. The personal estate, which was of the value of £48,000, consisted of £20,950 of heritable securities (convertible into cash on three months' premonition prior to a term of Whitsunday or Martinmas)—£5000 in the stock, crop, and implements on the farms of Surradale and Orchardfield, and the remainder of stock and shares.

The only asset of importance in point of amount which was not capable of early realisation was the stock, crop, and implements of the farms of Surradale and Orchardfield. At the request of James, the trustees had let the farms on a lease for nineteen years from Whitsunday 1888.

James died intestate on 24th June 1888, and unmarried.

At the time of his death the trustees had not made the conveyance in his favour of the heritable estate, with the plate and pictures, specified in the ninth purpose of the trust, nor had they apportioned and divided the residue of the estate.

Questions having arisen as to the distribution of the estate, this special case was presented to the Court by (1) the trustees of Mr Hugh Maclean; (2) George Maclean, James' younger brother, the next heir of provision; (3) Hugh and Elizabeth Maclean, James' elder brother and sister. The case set forth the facts above narrated.

The first parties maintained;—(1) That by the terms of the settlement they were not bound to proceed to convey the estates until twelve months from John's death had elapsed; (2) that in ordinary course it was not practicable to do so sooner, having regard to the magnitude of the estate and the nature of the investments, to the facts that until the crop of 1888 of the farms of Surradale and Orchardfield had been reaped, and the proceeds got in, and the rents of Westfield falling under John's executry had been collected, the residue in the sense of the settlement had not been ascertained, and they could not proceed to apportion and divide.

The second party maintained;—That the residue could only vest on actual payment, and that consequently no share therein vested in James. He also contended that he had the exclusive right to the plate and pictures, as being part of the subjects falling to be conveyed to him with the heritage as heir of provision under the settlement.

No. 188.

*Maclean's
 Macleans.*

The third parties maintained;—That the provisions in the testator's settlement in favour of the deceased James Maclean vested in him on the testator's death, subject to defeasance in the event of John Alexander Maclean being survived by lawful descendants, or otherwise that the said provisions vested in James Maclean at the death of John Alexander Maclean. They further contended that the plate and pictures fell into residue, or at all events, fell to be dealt with in the same manner as the residue. The third parties further maintained that in ordinary course the estate of Westfield and others, and the dwelling-house of Hythehill, might and should have been conveyed to James before his death, and that the residue of the estate should have been apportioned and divided among the residuary legatees, and that the fact of this not having been done could not prejudicially affect their interests in the succession.

The questions of law were;—“(1) Did a share of the residue vest in the person of the deceased James Maclean? (2) Do the plate and pictures form part of or fall to be dealt with in the same manner as the residue, or do they fall to be conveyed to the second party along with the heritage?”

Argued for the second party;—(1) As regarded the residue.—The testator had expressly provided that the shares of residue should not vest till the time of payment. As to the latter, the provision was that the trustees were, in the event of his son dying without leaving lawful issue, to divide the residue “within twelve months after that event, or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit.” The testator meant by this to give his trustees twelve months from John's death in which to realise, and as much time thereafter as circumstances rendered necessary. That was the only reasonable construction, and one which derived aid from the provision which he made in the 8th clause as to the residue in the event of John's dying and leaving issue. In these circumstances, he had directed the trustees to make the division “after the lapse of twelve months from the death” of John. He clearly anticipated that the trustees would require twelve months at least in which to realise. That being the sound construction of the clause, no vesting had taken place in James, who only survived John six months, unless it could successfully be maintained that the trustees had unduly delayed to realise.<sup>1</sup> The case of Ferrier<sup>2</sup> did not conflict with the cases of Howat's Trustees and Thorburn. (2) As regarded the plate and pictures.—It was quite true that the presumption of law in a destination of moveables was against substitution, and in favour of conditional institution, but the plate and pictures were combined with the heritage in the same destination. It was quite settled that a testator had the power to create a substitution in dealing with his personal estate; and it was always a question of intention whether he had done so. The destination would receive effect in the same manner both as regards his moveable and his heritable estate, unless the first beneficiary defeated that destination, in the case of heritage by making a new destination, or in the case of moveables by willing them away, or by consuming them. Here it was not a case of money, but plate and pictures, which were as defined in character as any heritage. There was no difficulty then in giving effect to the testator's intention, which was to create a substitution in the case of the plate and pictures as well as of the heritage.<sup>3</sup>

Argued for the third parties;—(1) As regarded the residue.—Vesting took place at John Maclean's death. The testator meant the trustees to realise so soon after John's death as circumstances would permit,—that was, as soon as possible. In that view James Maclean had a vested interest in the residue, because he survived John six months.<sup>1</sup> In Bryson's Trustees v. Clark, &c.,<sup>2</sup> the beneficiary had died before it was competent for the trustees to convey. In all the cases cited by the other parties vesting was excluded in the event of the beneficiary "dying before receiving payment." The dictum of Lord Corehouse in the case of Thorburn<sup>3</sup> was directly applicable here. In any view the trustees could have realised before James' death, and they ought to have done so. (2) As regarded the plate and pictures.—The beneficiaries' interest in them must be the same as if the trustees had done their duty, and conveyed them without undue delay. The presumption of law in a destination of moveables must be given effect to. It was in-favour of a conditional institution. The presumption was not displaced here.<sup>4</sup>

Trustees v.
Macleans.

At advising,—

LORD PRESIDENT.—By the settlement of Hugh Maclean of Westfield the object of the testator is expressed to be that his eldest son John Alexander should be restricted to an alimentary liferent of the estate, but that after his death the estate generally should go to his children. It turned out, however, that John Alexander had no children, and therefore the question we have to determine really arises upon the death without issue of John Alexander Maclean. Now, the part of the settlement which refers to that contingency is to be found under the ninth head, which is introduced by these words—"In the event the said John Alexander Maclean should die without any lawful descendants of his body, then, and in that event, I hereby direct and appoint my said trustees, within twelve months after the death of the said John Alexander Maclean, or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit, after making due provision for all the annuities, legacies, and bequests herein contained or referred to, and for the complete fulfilment of this my deed of settlement, to dispoise and convey my said lands and estate of Westfield, Inchshaggarty, and Inchbrock, specially above described, and my dwelling-house of Hythehill, offices and garden, with my plate and pictures, to James Maclean, my nephew, son of the said James Maclean, my brother, and the lawful heirs of his body; whom failing, to George Maclean, my nephew, a younger son of the said James Maclean, my brother, and the lawful heirs of his body." Now, as to the construction of that part of the clause I think there is very little room for question. I cannot doubt that George Maclean is called, either as a conditional institute or as substitute, as the case may be. If James Maclean predeceased John Alexander, of course he could not take, and George Maclean would take as conditional institute. But James Maclean survived the death of John Alexander by six months, or nearly so, and accordingly the right to the heritage vested in him, and upon his death intestate, and without having done anything in the way of evacuating the substitution, the substitution took effect in favour of George Maclean. With regard to the pictures and plate, they are within precisely the same destination as the heritable estate itself, and the direction is to dispose and convey the estate of Westfield "with my plate and pictures." There is no doubt about the intention of the testator to combine the two in order to prevent their separation, and a substitution in moveables is quite an effectual and regular mode of settling property of this description, provided always that that substitution is not defeated. I hold therefore that George Maclean, as substitute heir of provision, is entitled to the estate of Westfield and the pictures and plate as one indivisible subject.

But then there occurs another question, arising partly out of the construction of what I have already read, but partly also out of the construction of what follows,—“With regard to the residue and remainder of my means and estate, I, in the event of my son dying without lawful descendants of his body, and within twelve months after that event, or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit, direct and appoint my said trustees to apportion and divide the said residue among the children of my said brother James Maclean, equally, and share and share alike, whom I hereby appoint to be my residuary legatees.” Now, the question put upon the construction of that part of the clause is, whether the share of this residue vested in James Maclean, the nephew of the testator. James Maclean survived the death of John Alexander Maclean. John Alexander's death was in January, and James Maclean's death was in June, so that he survived five months, at all events, and the question is whether during that time the share of the residue vested in James Maclean. The direction to “pay, or divide, or apportion,” (the words are all used), is that it shall be done within twelve months of that event—that is, the death of John Alexander, “or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit.” But then there must be taken in connection with that also the further declaration which follows this clause, in which it is “declared that the share of the succession effeiring to the said residuary legatees shall become vested interests in their persons at and only upon the period of payment above mentioned.” There is no period of payment, no precise period of payment, mentioned in the deed, the direction being to divide “within twelve months of the death of John Alexander, or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit.” Now, the word “thereafter,” admits of two constructions, it may mean either after John Alexander's death, or after the expiry of twelve months from John Alexander's death. My opinion is that it has the former meaning, not only from the expression in this clause itself, but from the contents of the deed. The expression regarding the twelve months is that the division is to take place within twelve months. Now, that being so, it may take place at any time within twelve months; it may take place within one month as well as at the expiry of twelve months, because it is not on the expiry of twelve months that it is to take place, but at any time within twelve months; and it seems to me therefore that when the testator gives permission and implied direction to divide within twelve months at any time when it shall be practicable, he could hardly at the same moment, and in the same breath, have said, “or at any time after twelve months.” The same expression occurs in regard to the disposition of the heritable estate. There it is an appointment within twelve months after the death of John Alexander Maclean, or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit. There I think the meaning is the same. There is another part of the deed in which a different expression is used, and which, I think, was intended to have a different meaning. It is in regard to the residue of the estate in the event of John Alexander Maclean leaving more than one lawful child of his body. In that case the testator directs his trustees "after the lapse of twelve months from the death of John Alexander Maclean" to divide and apportion the residue. There his meaning is obviously different. Again, with regard to the conveyance of the heritable estate in the event of John Alexander Maclean predeceasing him, he directs that the heritable estate shall be conveyed to the eldest son of John Alexander Maclean "within the period of twelve months after that event." So that these expressions stand in contrast with the one which is used with regard to the division of the residue among the children of John Alexander Maclean, if he has any; and upon the whole deed I come to the conclusion that it is in the power of these trustees, and indeed it is almost a direction, that they should divide the estate as soon as possible,—as soon as circumstances will permit after the death of John Alexander Maclean.

Now, that being so, the nature of the testator's estate comes to be very important. If it had been of such a mixed character that it really could not be ingathered and divided except after a long period of administration, I can quite understand that that would influence the construction of this clause. I think it would suggest probably that the "thereafter" meant to give a large discretion to the trustees as to the time within which they could realise, and that they might either realise and divide within the twelve months or after the twelve months, as they found convenient and practicable. But if we find, as I think we do, that the estate of the testator is very easily realisable, and is just of that description which can be realised quite well within an ordinary period, say within six months of the testator's death, which is the period very frequently allowed to trustees, or even within a shorter period, then that carries one's mind in favour of the construction which I have put upon the word "thereafter," so as to give the direction this meaning,—“Realise and divide as soon as possible. You shall do it at anyrate within twelve months, there can be no difficulty about that, but do it as soon as you can after the death of John Alexander without issue.” Now, what is the nature of the estate as we have it disclosed in the statement made of the personal estate as at the death of John Alexander? There is about £20,000 worth of heritable bonds. Now, these are very easily realisable. In the first place, the trustees had plenty of time before the term of Whitsunday after the death of John Alexander to call up those bonds, or if that was inconvenient and undesirable from the nature of the arrangement made at the granting of the security, they could at all events get their market value by transfer or assignation. Nothing can be more easily realised than that. Then the bulk of the estate otherwise consists of stocks and shares, which are in the market every day, and which can be sold at any time whenever convenient to the trustees; and really the only asset of the estate that is of the smallest importance in point of amount that could not be at once realised is the farm stock, crop, and implements of two farms. The amount of these is a little over £5000, and the amount of the entire estate is £48,000. Is the division of this estate to be tied up and nothing done because it is impossible at once to realise the farm stock, crop, and implements? I do not think that that is a fair way of dealing with a direction of this kind. It seems to me that the true meaning of the testator, and of the words he has used, is that when the bulk of the estate is fit to be divided, when it has been realised and is in such a shape that that can be done, then it is to be divided. The declaration that the shares of the residue are to become vested interests at and only upon the period of payment above mentioned does not involve any difficulty, because there is no fixed time of payment, as I have said, and it cannot mean—at least I think it does not mean—that nothing is to vest until it is actually paid if it be in a condition fit for distribution. If the estate is in the hands of the trustees, fit for division, and capable of division, then I think it is the duty of the trustees to divide; and if that duty is imposed upon them, their mere delay in the performance of that duty will make no difference on the rights of parties, because they were under an obligation to divide as soon as they could, and therefore the period of payment being fixed as the date of vesting merely means that when the period has arrived at which the trustees are in a condition to divide then the right shall vest. I am therefore for answering the first question in the affirmative.

With regard to the second question I have already expressed my opinion that the plate and pictures fall to be dealt with in the same manner as the heritable estate, and are inseparable from it.

LORD MURK.—I am of the same opinion. I think that this first question put to us should be answered in the affirmative, namely, that the residue vested in James Maclean—that is, his share of it—and I do so upon the same construction of the clause in the settlement that your Lordship has referred to. I think that in the whole of the ninth purpose the event in view is the death of John Alexander, and I think the words in the residue clause “within twelve months after that event, or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit,” may be read “within twelve months after the death of John Alexander, or so soon after his death as circumstances will permit.” In that view of it, and seeing that the residue admitted of being realised before the death of James Maclean, I think the share may be fairly held to have vested in him by the operation of that clause. On the second question, I agree with your Lordship that the plate and pictures form part of and fall to be dealt with as part of the residue.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion also, that the first question should be answered in the affirmative. That question relates to the residue, and, as your Lordship has pointed out, there is a very special clause which declares that “the shares of succession effeiring to the residuary legatees shall become vested interests in their persons at and only upon the period of payment above mentioned.” The question we have to determine is, what is that period of payment? The word “period” is not a very accurate term to use with reference to the payment. I read it as referring only to the term or time of payment above mentioned,—referring to one point of time. Now that depends upon the earlier clause of the deed, on which your Lordship has commented. The particular clause requiring to be construed is this:—“In the event the said John Alexander Maclean should die without any lawful descendants of his body, then, and in that event, I hereby direct and appoint my said trustees, within twelve months after the death of the said John Alexander Maclean, or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit.” It is clear that the word “event” there refers to the event of the son dying, and the only question of difficulty is, whether the word "thereafter" refers to the word "event" or to the words "twelve months" which immediately precede it. I am disposed to think with your Lordships that the word "thereafter" refers to "event" and not to the "twelve months," so that the clause would read in this way,—In the event of my son dying without lawful descendants of his body, within twelve months after that event, or as soon after that event as circumstances will permit." If the clause be so read it rather appears to me that it would result that the deed might be construed as making the death of John Alexander, his son, the period of vesting, because after all that would simply come to be a direction to this effect,—"I leave the residue of my estate to be divided amongst those persons as soon as circumstances will permit." And if that be so, I take it that in a case where there was no other direction the vesting would be held to take place at the death. But I am clear that in any view that may be taken of the deed, looking to the nature of the estate, vesting did occur, because even if you read the clause in the other way suggested, namely, "within twelve months after that event, or as soon after the expiry of twelve months as circumstances will permit," the purpose expressed is that twelve months is given if required to realise the estate, but nothing more. But no direction, such as your Lordship pointed out, occurred in the other part of the deed to divide after the lapse of twelve months; it is all within twelve months. Accordingly, I hold with your Lordship that if the estate is of such a nature that (with the exception of a comparatively small amount of the whole that is divisible) it is clear that it might be divided a short time after the testator's death, it shall be held to have been so divided, or, at all events, that that is the time or term of payment at which it should be divided. Well, John Alexander Maclean died in January, but the estate could all have been realised admittedly, with the exception of the crop and stock, at the succeeding term of Whitsunday 1888. The bonds could all have been called up, because there was time for three months' premonition, and the other parts of the estate were clearly realisable, and therefore at Whitsunday 1888 this estate was in a condition to be divided and was divisible, and James Maclean surviving until June following, I am of opinion that the share of the residue vested in him.

I entirely concur in your Lordships' view upon the second question, which is the only other one we have to answer.

LORD ADAM.—I arrive at the same result, although perhaps not quite by the same road as your Lordships. I do not put the same construction upon the first clause relating to residue; my view of its construction is rather this, that the direction is to pay the residue in the event of the son dying without lawful descendants within twelve months after that event. So far as that goes, I read that as a direction to pay, not at twelve months, but as soon as circumstances will permit within twelve months. I think that is the meaning of that clause—at any time within twelve months, or as soon as circumstances will permit within twelve months. If that be the meaning of that clause, if you go on to read the next clause, "so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit," putting the meaning on the word "thereafter" which your Lordship proposed, namely, as referring to the event of the death, and as meaning as soon after the death as circumstances will permit, that is just, in my mind, repeating again what has already been directed by the first branch of the clause, which I do not think is accordingly the right to the heritage vested in him, and upon his death intestate, and without having done anything in the way of evacuating the substitution, the substitution took effect in favour of George Maclean. With regard to the pictures and plate, they are within precisely the same destination as the heritable estate itself, and the direction is to dispose and convey the estate of Westfield "with my plate and pictures." There is no doubt about the intention of the testator to combine the two in order to prevent their separation, and a substitution in moveables is quite an effectual and regular mode of settling property of this description, provided always that that substitution is not defeated. I hold therefore that George Maclean, as substitute heir of provision, is entitled to the estate of Westfield and the pictures and plate as one indivisible subject.

But then there occurs another question, arising partly out of the construction of what I have already read, but partly also out of the construction of what follows,—“With regard to the residue and remainder of my means and estate, I, in the event of my son dying without lawful descendants of his body, and within twelve months after that event, or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit, direct and appoint my said trustees to apportion and divide the said residue among the children of my said brother James Maclean, equally, and share and share alike, whom I hereby appoint to be my residuary legatees.” Now, the question put upon the construction of that part of the clause is, whether the share of this residue vested in James Maclean, the nephew of the testator. James Maclean survived the death of John Alexander Maclean. John Alexander's death was in January, and James Maclean's death was in June, so that he survived five months, at all events, and the question is whether during that time the share of the residue vested in James Maclean. The direction to “pay, or divide, or apportion,” (the words are all used), is that it shall be done within twelve months of that event—that is, the death of John Alexander, “or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit.” But then there must be taken in connection with that also the further declaration which follows this clause, in which it is “declared that the share of the succession effeiring to the said residuary legatees shall become vested interests in their persons at and only upon the period of payment above mentioned.” There is no period of payment, no precise period of payment, mentioned in the deed, the direction being to divide “within twelve months of the death of John Alexander, or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit.” Now, the word “thereafter,” admits of two constructions, it may mean either after John Alexander's death, or after the expiry of twelve months from John Alexander's death. My opinion is that it has the former meaning, not only from the expression in this clause itself, but from the contents of the deed. The expression regarding the twelve months is that the division is to take place within twelve months. Now, that being so, it may take place at any time within twelve months; it may take place within one month as well as at the expiry of twelve months, because it is not on the expiry of twelve months that it is to take place, but at any time within twelve months; and it seems to me therefore that when the testator gives permission and implied direction to divide within twelve months at any time when it shall be practicable, he could hardly at the same moment, and in the same breath, have said, “or at any time after twelve months.” The same expression occurs in regard to the disposition of the heritable estate. There it is an appointment within twelve months after the death of John Alexander Maclean, or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit. There I think the meaning is the same. There is another part of the deed in which a different expression is used, and which, I think, was intended to have a different meaning. It is in regard to the residue of the estate in the event of John Alexander Maclean leaving more than one lawful child of his body. In that case the testator directs his trustees "after the lapse of twelve months from the death of John Alexander Maclean" to divide and apportion the residue. There his meaning is obviously different. Again, with regard to the conveyance of the heritable estate in the event of John Alexander Maclean predeceasing him, he directs that the heritable estate shall be conveyed to the eldest son of John Alexander Maclean "within the period of twelve months after that event." So that these expressions stand in contrast with the one which is used with regard to the division of the residue among the children of John Alexander Maclean, if he has any; and upon the whole deed I come to the conclusion that it is in the power of these trustees, and indeed it is almost a direction, that they should divide the estate as soon as possible,—as soon as circumstances will permit after the death of John Alexander Maclean.

Maclean's

Now, that being so, the nature of the testator's estate comes to be very important. If it had been of such a mixed character that it really could not be ingathered and divided except after a long period of administration, I can quite understand that that would influence the construction of this clause. I think it would suggest probably that the "thereafter" meant to give a large discretion to the trustees as to the time within which they could realise, and that they might either realise and divide within the twelve months or after the twelve months, as they found convenient and practicable. But if we find, as I think we do, that the estate of the testator is very easily realisable, and is just of that description which can be realised quite well within an ordinary period, say within six months of the testator's death, which is the period very frequently allowed to trustees, or even within a shorter period, then that carries one's mind in favour of the construction which I have put upon the word "thereafter," so as to give the direction this meaning,—“Realise and divide as soon as possible. You shall do it at anyrate within twelve months, there can be no difficulty about that, but do it as soon as you can after the death of John Alexander without issue.” Now, what is the nature of the estate as we have it disclosed in the statement made of the personal estate as at the death of John Alexander? There is about £20,000 worth of heritable bonds. Now, these are very easily realisable. In the first place, the trustees had plenty of time before the term of Whitsunday after the death of John Alexander to call up those bonds, or if that was inconvenient and undesirable from the nature of the arrangement made at the granting of the security, they could at all events get their market value by transfer or assignation. Nothing can be more easily realised than that. Then the bulk of the estate otherwise consists of stocks and shares, which are in the market every day, and which can be sold at any time whenever convenient to the trustees; and really the only asset of the estate that is of the smallest importance in point of amount that could not be at once realised is the farm stock, crop, and implements of two farms. The amount of these is a little over £5000, and the amount of the entire estate is £48,000. Is the division of this estate to be tied up and nothing done because it is impossible at once to realise the farm stock, crop, and implements? I do not think that that is a fair way of dealing with a direction of this kind. It seems to me that the true meaning of the testator, and of the words he has used, is that when the bulk of the estate is fit to be divided, when it has been realised and is in such a shape that that can be done, then it is to be divided. The declaration that the shares of the residue are to become vested interests at and only upon the period of payment above mentioned does not involve any difficulty, because there is no fixed time of payment, as I have said, and it cannot mean—at least I think it does not mean—that nothing is to vest until it is actually paid if it be in a condition fit for distribution. If the estate is in the hands of the trustees, fit for division, and capable of division, then I think it is the duty of the trustees to divide; and if that duty is imposed upon them, their mere delay in the performance of that duty will make no difference on the rights of parties, because they were under an obligation to divide as soon as they could, and therefore the period of payment being fixed as the date of vesting merely means that when the period has arrived at which the trustees are in a condition to divide then the right shall vest. I am therefore for answering the first question in the affirmative.

With regard to the second question I have already expressed my opinion that the plate and pictures fall to be dealt with in the same manner as the heritable estate, and are inseparable from it.

LORD MURE.—I am of the same opinion. I think that this first question put to us should be answered in the affirmative, namely, that the residue vested in James Maclean—that is, his share of it—and I do so upon the same construction of the clause in the settlement that your Lordship has referred to. I think that in the whole of the ninth purpose the event in view is the death of John Alexander, and I think the words in the residue clause “within twelve months after that event, or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit,” may be read “within twelve months after the death of John Alexander, or so soon after his death as circumstances will permit.” In that view of it, and seeing that the residue admitted of being realised before the death of James Maclean, I think the share may be fairly held to have vested in him by the operation of that clause. On the second question, I agree with your Lordship that the plate and pictures form part of and fall to be dealt with as part of the residue.

LORD SHAND.—I am of the same opinion also, that the first question should be answered in the affirmative. That question relates to the residue, and, as your Lordship has pointed out, there is a very special clause which declares that “the shares of succession effeiring to the residuary legatees shall become vested interests in their persons at and only upon the period of payment above mentioned.” The question we have to determine is, what is that period of payment? The word “period” is not a very accurate term to use with reference to the payment. I read it as referring only to the term or time of payment above mentioned,—referring to one point of time. Now that depends upon the earlier clause of the deed, on which your Lordship has commented. The particular clause requiring to be construed is this:—“In the event the said John Alexander Maclean should die without any lawful descendants of his body, then, and in that event, I hereby direct and appoint my said trustees, within twelve months after the death of the said John Alexander Maclean, or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit.” It is clear that the word “event” there refers to the event of the son dying, and the only question of difficulty is, whether the word "thereafter" refers to the word "event" or to the words "twelve months" which immediately precede it. I am disposed to think with your Lordships that the word "thereafter" refers to "event" and not to the "twelve months," so that the clause would read in this way,—“In the event of my son dying without lawful descendants of his body, within twelve months after that event, or as soon after that event as circumstances will permit.” If the clause be so read it rather appears to me that it would result that the deed might be construed as making the death of John Alexander, his son, the period of vesting, because after all that would simply come to be a direction to this effect,—“I leave the residue of my estate to be divided amongst those persons as soon as circumstances will permit.” And if that be so, I take it that in a case where there was no other direction the vesting would be held to take place at the death. But I am clear that in any view that may be taken of the deed, looking to the nature of the estate, vesting did occur, because even if you read the clause in the other way suggested, namely, “within twelve months after that event, or as soon after the expiry of twelve months as circumstances will permit,” the purpose expressed is that twelve months is given if required to realise the estate, but nothing more. But no direction, such as your Lordship pointed out, occurred in the other part of the deed to divide after the lapse of twelve months; it is all within twelve months. Accordingly, I hold with your Lordship that if the estate is of such a nature that (with the exception of a comparatively small amount of the whole that is divisible) it is clear that it might be divided a short time after the testator's death, it shall be held to have been so divided, or, at all events, that that is the time or term of payment at which it should be divided. Well, John Alexander Maclean died in January, but the estate could all have been realised admittedly, with the exception of the crop and stock, at the succeeding term of Whitsunday 1888. The bonds could all have been called up, because there was time for three months' premonition, and the other parts of the estate were clearly realisable, and therefore at Whitsunday 1888 this estate was in a condition to be divided and was divisible, and James Maclean surviving until June following, I am of opinion that the share of the residue vested in him.

I entirely concur in your Lordships' view upon the second question, which is the only other one we have to answer.

LORD ADAM.—I arrive at the same result, although perhaps not quite by the same road as your Lordships. I do not put the same construction upon the first clause relating to residue; my view of its construction is rather this, that the direction is to pay the residue in the event of the son dying without lawful descendants within twelve months after that event. So far as that goes, I read that as a direction to pay, not at twelve months, but as soon as circumstances will permit within twelve months. I think that is the meaning of that clause—at any time within twelve months, or as soon as circumstances will permit within twelve months. If that be the meaning of that clause, if you go on to read the next clause, “so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit,” putting the meaning on the word “thereafter” which your Lordship proposed, namely, as referring to the event of the death, and as meaning as soon after the death as circumstances will permit, that is just, in my mind, repeating again what has already been directed by the first branch of the clause, which I do not think is

No. 188.

Maclean's
Trustees v.
Macleans.

No. 188. a natural reading, and therefore it occurs to my mind that the antecedent of "thereafter" is "twelve months," and I would read the clause so—as a direction to pay within twelve months after the death of the son, or so soon after the twelve months as circumstances will permit. But although that is my reading of the clause, it appears to me practically to come to the same thing, because to my mind it is a direction by the truster to pay and divide as soon as circumstances will permit. That is practically, on either construction of the clause, what it comes to, and I do not think the different views of the possible construction of the clause are at all material as to the result. Then we come to the other clause, "declaring that the share of the succession effeiring to said residuary legatees shall become vested interests in their persons at and only upon the period of payment above mentioned." I think that refers back to the period of actual payment, and not to any other time as sometimes occurs in these cases, but although I think it refers to the period of actual payment it is in this case not the time when payment is actually made, but when payment ought to have been made subject to the direction of the truster, because that is what is meant in such a clause by the period of payment. Now, in this case, looking at the estate which we have to deal with here, it is quite obvious that the great bulk of it might have been realised and ready for payment within a short time after the death of John Alexander Maclean. Nearly eight-ninths of it might have been realised and ready for division long before Whitsunday 1888, and if that be so, I agree with your Lordship that the vesting of the estate, or payment of that portion of the estate which can be realised, is not to be delayed because a fraction of it is not ingathered or capable of being ingathered. I am therefore of opinion that the whole of the estate vested certainly before the Whitsunday term and before the death of James Maclean.

As regards the plate and pictures, I concur with your Lordship.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Find and declare that a share of the residue vested in the person of the deceased James Maclean, the testator's nephew: Find and declare that the plate and pictures fall to be conveyed to the second party along with the heritage," &c.

 Durie's Trustees v. Earl of Elgin.

Superior and Vassal—Contract to grant feu-charter with precept of sasine—Obligation to relieve from minister's stipend and public burdens—Charters by progress.—In 1764 C. and D. entered into a contract and agreement to the effect that "the said C. has sold and disposed, and binds and obliges him, his heirs and successors, to grant a feu-right to the said D, his heirs and successors," of sixty acres of land, "to be held in feu-farm and heritage of the said C., his heirs and successors, for yearly payment of £3 sterling, at the term of Martinmas yearly, . . . and to assign the rents from and after Martinmas 1765, and to free and relieve the said ground of all minister's stipend, schoolmaster's salary, cess, and all other public burdens, in all time coming, except the said feu-duty, and to make the said public a real burden upon his other lands, and also the said C. binds him and his foressaids to enclose the said sixty acres betwixt and Martinmas 1766, . . . for the which causes and on the other part the said D., on the said C. performing his part of the premises—that is, granting the said feu-contract in the terms above narrated, binds and obliges him, his heirs and successors, to content and pay to the said C., his heirs, executors, and successors whatsoever, the sum of £600 sterling at Martinmas 1765, . . . and to pay £3 of feu at Martinmas, beginning the first year's payment at Martinmas 1765." The deed contained a precept of sasine, on which D. took infeftment in May 1776.

No. 189.

Durie's Trustees
v. Earl of
Elgin.

In 1888 a singular successor of D., who was duly entered with the superior under a charter of confirmation, which did not set forth an obligation by the superior to relieve the vassal of public burdens, raised an action against the superior, who was a singular successor of C., concluding for declarator that the defender as superior was bound to relieve the pursuer of public burdens.

The pursuer founded on the deed of 1764 as shewing that the obligation to relieve of public burdens was a condition of the feu.

It did not appear that a feu-contract ever was granted, or that the £600 was ever paid.

Held that while it would have been competent for the vassal to refer to a feu-contract constituting his right to shew that the obligation to relieve of public burdens was a condition of the feu, the contract of 1764 was not a feu-contract, but merely a personal obligation to grant a feu-contract, and that the obligation to relieve of public burdens was merely a personal obligation, which could not be enforced against a singular successor in the superiority.

THIS action was raised by Hugh Bruce Dewar and others, the marriage-contract trustees of Dr Andrew Dewar Durie and his wife, Mrs Eliza Durie, against the Earl of Elgin and Kincardine, to have it found and declared "that the defender, as superior of the sixty acres Scots measure of the Room of Drumtuthill, lying in the parish of Dunfermline and county of Fife, being the lands described in a contract of agreement and disposition dated 5th June 1764, and registered in the Books of Council and Session, 3d October 1792, entered into between George Chalmers, merchant in Edinburgh, and William Drysdale, tenant in Drumtuthill, of the dominium utile of which lands the pursuers, as trustees aforesaid, are proprietors, is bound to free and relieve the said lands of all minister's stipend, schoolmaster's salary, cess, and all other public burdens in all time coming, excepting the feu-duty payable by the said lands, and also to make repetition to the pursuers of all payments they have made or may yet make in respect of such minister's stipend, schoolmaster's salary, cess, and public burdens since the term of Martinmas 1882, being the date at which the defender became superior of the said lands."

1st Division.
Lord Kinnear.
C.

At the date of the action, the pursuers were in possession of the sixty acres on the following titles:—

Trust-disposition and settlement, by Dr Charles Durie of Craighluscar, in favour of Henry Black and others, as trustees, dated 13th January 1838, and codicil thereto, dated 12th February 1845.

Instruments of sasine thereon in favour of the said Henry Black and others, Dr Durie's trustees, dated 21st May, and recorded in the Particular Register of Sasines for the shire of Fife, 20th June 1845.

Charter of confirmation, dated 26th June 1856, by John Buchan Hepburn, then superior of the lands, a singular successor of George Chalmers above mentioned, in favour of the said Henry Black and others, Dr Durie's trustees, confirming to them the sixty acres and the said infeftment, with the following tenendas and reddendo:—"To be holden the said lands and others immediately of me and my foressaids, superiors thereof, in feu-farm, fee, and heritage for ever; paying therefor yearly the sum of £3 sterling at the term of Martinmas, and doubling the said

No. 189. feu-duty the first year at the entry of every heir and singular successor, and being thirled to Meldrum's Mill, conform as the said lands are thirled." This charter contained no reference to the contract of 1764, or to any obligation by the superior to relieve the vassal of public burdens.

Durie's Trustees v. Earl of Elgin.

Disposition, dated March 1860, and recorded in the General Register of Sasines, 5th April 1860, by Dr Durie's trustees, in favour of Robert Durie of Craigluscar.

Writ of confirmation, dated 30th April 1868, confirming the last-mentioned disposition, in so far as consistent with the charter of confirmation of 1856.

Disposition by Mrs Durie of Craigluscar, with consent of her husband, in favour of the pursuers, dated 8th, and recorded 12th April 1869.

Writ of confirmation, dated 9th June 1869 (written upon the last-mentioned disposition), by John Buchan Hepburn, confirming the same "only so far as consistent with the charter of confirmation granted by me, as superior foresaid, in favour of Henry Black," &c., dated 26th June 1856.

The pursuer founded on the following deeds:—

The contract, dated 5th June 1764, between George Chalmers and William Drysdale, which bore that the parties thereto had agreed as follows:—"That is to say, the said Mr George Chalmers has sold and disposed, and binds and obliges him, his heirs and successors, to grant a feu-right to the said William Drysdale, his heirs and successors, of sixty acres Scots measure of the Room of Drumtuthel [Here followed a description of the lands], to be held in feu-farm and heritage of the said Mr George Chalmers, his heirs and successors, for yearly payment of £3 sterling at the term of Martinmas yearly, . . . and to assign the rents from and after the term of Martinmas 1765 for crop and year 1766, and to free and relieve the said ground of all minister's stipend, school-master's salary, cess, and all other public burdens in all time coming, except the said feu-duty, and to make the said public a real burden upon his other lands; and also the said George Chalmers binds and obliges him and his foresaids to enclose the said sixty acres, betwixt and Martinmas 1766, on the east, south, and west sides, with a sufficient stone dyke six quarters high, which dykes are afterwards to be upheld on their mutual expenses: For the which causes, and on the other part, the said William Drysdale, on the said Mr Chalmers performing his part of the premises,—that is, granting the said feu-contract in the terms above narrated,—binds and obliges him, his heirs and successors, to content and pay to the said Mr George Chalmers, his heirs, executors, and successors whatsoever, the sum of £600 sterling, and that at and against the term of Martinmas 1765, with a fifth part more of penalty in case of failure, and annual rent after the said term of payment during the not payment, and to pay yearly the sum of £3 sterling of feu at Martinmas, beginning the first year's payment at Martinmas 1766 for the crop 1766, and so forth yearly in all time coming, and to double the said feu each year at the entry of every heir and singular successor, and to grind his victuals at Meldrum's Mill, conform to the thirlage of the said lands: Attour to the effect the said William Drysdale and his foresaids may be infeft in the said sixty acres, the said Mr George Chalmers desires and requires and ilk one of you conjunctly and severally his baillies in that part, that, incontinent this his precept seen, ye pass to the ground of the said sixty acres, and there give and deliver heritable state and sasine," &c.

Instrument of sasine following thereon in favour of William Drysdale, recorded in the Register of Sasines for the shire of Fife on 17th May 1766, which bore,—“Compeared personally William Drysdale, tenant in Drumtuthill, and past with Robert Drysdale, residenter in Drumtuthill, No. 189. baillie in that part underwritten, specially constitute by the precept of sasine after insert, to the ground of the lands and others after mentioned, and there the said William Drysdale having and holding in his hands a contract of sale of the date underwritten, entered into betwixt Mr George Chalmers, merchant in Edinburgh, and the said William Drysdale, on the one and other parts, whereby, for the causes therein specified, the said Mr George Chalmers sold, disposed, and bound and obliged him, his heirs and successors, to grant a feu-right to the said William Drysdale, his heirs and successors, of sixty acres Scots measure of the Room of Drumtuthill. [Here followed the description of the lands.] To be held in feu-farm and heritage of the said Mr George Chalmers, his heirs and successors, for yearly payment of £3 sterling at the term of Martinmas yearly, . . . and to free and relieve the said of all minister's stipend, schoolmaster's salary, cess, and all other publick burdens in all time coming, except the said feu, and to make the said publick a real burden upon his other lands, which contract of sale, containing as said is, the said William Drysdale presented to the said Robert Drysdale, baillie in that part foresaid, desiring him to proceed to his office of baillary thereby committed to him, which desire the said Robert Drysdale, baillie in that part foresaid, found reasonable, and received the said contract of sale into his hands," &c. "After open reading and publishing of which contract of sale and precept of sasine before insert therein contained, the said Robert Drysdale, baillie in that part foresaid, gave and delivered heritable state and sasine," &c.

Elgin.

Disposition, dated 15th April 1769, by William Drysdale, in favour of Charles Durie of Craighluscar, of the sixty acres. Disposition, dated 8th April 1779, and registered 3d October 1792, by William Drysdale, in corroboration of the above disposition in favour of Charles Durie. This latter deed contained the following clause:—"Which lands, with the teinds and others foresaid, were sold and disposed to me by the said George Chalmers by the contract of sale before mentioned, and which contains an obligation upon the said George Chalmers to free and relieve the said lands, teinds, and others foresaid, of all minister's stipend, schoolmaster's salary, cess, and all other public burdens, except the feu-duty of £3 sterling therein mentioned, and to make the said public burdens a real burden upon his other lands."

Upon this disposition Charles Durie was infeft, conform to instrument of sasine recorded in the Register of Sasines for the shire of Fife 22d May 1779.

Disposition, dated 4th October 1792 by Charles Durie to Robert Scotland of forty out of the sixty acres, and upon this disposition the latter was infeft, conform to instrument of sasine recorded 1st December 1792.

Disposition and assignation, dated 2d September 1794 by Scotland of the forty acres to Robert Russell, who was infeft therein, conform to instrument of sasine recorded 18th December 1807.

Charter of confirmation, dated 14th May 1814, by Thomas Hog of Newliston, who had acquired from George Chalmers the superiority of the lands of Drumtuthill, ratifying and confirming in favour of Robert Russell, his heirs and assignees, the following deeds:—(1) The disposition by Drysdale in favour of Charles Durie, dated 15th April 1769; (2) the disposition dated 8th April 1779 by Drysdale in favour of the same person, "whereby, in corroboration of the former disposition and the several obligations therein contained, and without prejudice thereto or derogation thereof, the said William Drysdale sold, alienated, and disposed from him and his foressaids, to and in favour of the said Charles Durie," the sixty acres, &c., "which lands, with the teinds and others

No. 189. foresaid, were sold and disposed to the said William Drysdale by the said George Chalmers by contract of sale entered into between them, dated the 5th day of June 1764, and which contains an obligation upon the said George Chalmers to free and relieve the said ground of all minister's stipend, schoolmaster's salary, cess, and all other public burdens, except the feu-duty of £3 stg. therein mentioned, and to make the said public burdens a real burden upon the other lands, together with the obligation to infest a me vel de me, procuratory of resignation, precept of sasine, and other clauses contained in the said disposition."

Durie's Trustees v. Earl of Elgin.

The deed then narrated the instrument of sasine on the last-mentioned disposition and the deeds above mentioned, forming Robert Russell's title to the forty acres.

The defender, as regarded the contract of 1764, averred;—"It is explained that the sum of £600 which William Drysdale undertook in said contract to pay was never paid, and that no feu-right or charter was ever granted by George Chalmers therein mentioned to William Drysdale. The said deed does not contain any de presenti dispositive words, and was truly a provisional deed only, it being in the contemplation of the parties thereto, that a formal charter or other appropriate feudal deed, or as it is called in said contract a 'feu-right' should afterwards be granted. The only substantive obligation undertaken by George Chalmers in the said deed was to grant a feu-right or charter to Drysdale, and quoad ultra the deed merely sets forth the clauses and obligations which the charter, when granted, should contain. . . . The intention of parties, as expressed in the 'contract and agreement,' was that the stipend and public burdens effeiring to the feu should be made a burden on other lands belonging to Chalmers, and it was not intended that an obligation of relief should transmit as an obligation against the successors in the superiority." (Ans. 7) "Explained that the charter of confirmation by John Buchan Hepburn, dated 26th June 1856, was the first charter granted which embraced the whole sixty acres of Drumtuthill, and that it contains no reference to the contract of 1764, or to the obligation of relief therein now founded on by the pursuers."

The defender further averred that although the present question was raised for the first time so far back as 1856, there was no reference in the deeds of 1860, 1868, and 1869, to the contract of 1764, or to the obligation to relieve.

The pursuers averred;—"Denied that the question of the right of the vassals to enforce against the superior the obligation of relief was raised in 1856 for the first time; and it is believed and averred that it was then for the first time that the superior denied that that right was in the vassals. It is believed and averred that during the period between the granting of the original feu-right in 1764 and the date of the foresaid charter of confirmation in 1814, the superiors as regularly relieved the vassals of the public burdens in question as the vassals paid the annual feu-duty of £3 to the superiors, and that the same course was followed until the question was raised in 1856." They further averred that they were singular successors in the lands in question, and acquired them on the faith of the records, which disclosed the obligation of relief from further burdens as an inherent condition of the feu.

The pursuers pleaded, inter alia;—(1) On a sound construction of the clause of relief contained in the contract agreement and disposition of 5th June 1764, the pursuers are entitled to decree of declarator in terms of the declaratory conclusions of the summons. (3) The obligation of relief in question is an inherent condition of the original feu-right of 1764, and has never been abrogated. (4) The pursuers are onerous dispones, and singular successors in the feu, and were and are entitled to No. 189.

 rely upon the records, which disclose the existence of the obligation of relief in question. (5) The feu-right of 1764 is the writ which confers July 19, 1889.
 on the defender the right to the feu-duty, payable under the same; and Durie's Trushe cannot enforce payment thereof, and yet refuse to perform his counter- tees v. Earl of part of the contract, including this obligation of relief of burdens. Elgin.

The defender pleaded, inter alia;—(1) The pursuers' averments are irrelevant and insufficient to support the conclusions of the summons. (3) On a sound construction of the titles of parties, especially as explained by the actings of parties and their authors, and by prescriptive practice and possession, the pursuers have no right to the relief claimed. (4) The contract of 1764 merely set forth an agreement as to the clauses and obligations which the feu-charter when granted should contain, and the contract itself contained no obligation of relief, but in any view the obligation of relief from public burdens was, and was intended to be, personal, and not transmissible against singular successors in the superiority of the feu; and separatim, the said obligation, assuming it to have been granted, not having been validly transmitted against the defender, or in favour of the pursuers, the defender is entitled to absolvitor. (5) The obligation of relief alleged by the pursuers never having been validly constituted a real burden on the superiority of the lands in question, the defender is entitled to absolvitor, with expenses. (7) Assuming the agreement of 1764 to have contained a valid obligation of relief, it has been extinguished by the negative prescription.

On 31st December 1888 the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) assoilzied the defender from the conclusions of the summons, and decerned.*

* "OPINION.—The question is, whether the pursuers, as proprietors of the dominium utile of certain lands in the county of Fife, are entitled to be relieved by the defender, as their immediate superior, of 'all minister's stipend, schoolmaster's salary, cess, and other public burdens,' now and in all time coming. The latest renewals of the investiture prior to the Act of 1874 were effected by a charter of confirmation in 1856, and by writs of confirmation in 1868 and 1869; and these instruments express no obligation of the kind now sought to be enforced. But the pursuers maintain that no mere omission in charters by progress can alter the terms of the investiture, and that the question must therefore be determined by the conditions of the original grant. As a general proposition, this is perfectly correct. But the peculiarity of the present case is, that the instrument upon which the pursuers found is not a grant of the lands, but a mere personal contract to make such a grant on the performance of a certain condition. And the defender maintains that, as a singular successor, he is in no way bound by the obligations contained in the personal contracts of a remote author.

"The contract in question was entered into in 1764 between George Chalmers, then proprietor of the plenum dominium, and William Drysdale. It contains no de presenti conveyance. But it sets forth that Chalmers 'has sold and disposed, and binds and obliges himself, his heirs and successors, to grant a feu-right to the said William Drysdale' of sixty acres of the Room of Drumtuthill, which are specifically described 'to be held in feu-farm and heritage of the said George Chalmers, his heirs and successors, for yearly payment of £3 sterling; . . . and to assign the rents from and after the term of Martinmas 1765 for crop and year 1766, and to free and relieve the said ground of all minister's stipend, schoolmaster's salary, cess, and all other public burdens in all time coming, except the said feu-duty, and to make the said public a real burden upon his other lands; and also the said George Chalmers binds and obliges him and his foresaids to enclose the said sixty acres betwixt and Martinmas 1766, on the east, south, and west sides, with a sufficient stone dyke six quarters high, which dykes are afterwards to be upheld on their mutual expenses: For the which causes and on the other part the said William Drysdale,

No. 189.

 Durie's Trustees
 v. Earl of
 Elgin.

The pursuers reclaimed, and argued ;—Although the latest renewals of the investiture prior to the Conveyancing Act, 1874, contained no menon the said Mr Chalmers performing his part of the premises,—that is, granting the said feu-contract in the terms above narrated,—binds and obliges him' to pay to Chalmers the sum of £600 at and against the term of Martinmas 1765. That this is not a feu-contract, but an obligation to execute and deliver such a contract, in return for a payment of money to be made at a future term, is perfectly clear. But although it is not a conveyance, it contained a precept of sasine ; and the pursuers found upon an instrument of sasine following upon the precept, dated and recorded in May 1766, by which they maintain that William Drysdale was duly infeft in the lands, upon the conditions expressed in the contract of sale. If this sasine had stood alone, it could not, in my judgment, have been upheld as a valid infeftment. There is authority for holding that at an earlier period a precept alone secundum chartam conficiendam might have been sustained as a valid title, if followed by possession, even if no charter had afterwards been made out. But even if this had been still a recognised method of infeftment in 1766, the sasine would be invalid, because the stipulations of the contract in which the precept is contained exclude the possibility of its being used as a warrant for present infeftment. A contract to grant a charter in consideration of a payment of money at a certain future date could not be of itself a warrant for infeftment, notwithstanding that it contained a precept. It gives no absolute right to obtain infeftment. To acquire such a right it was necessary for the feuar to satisfy the condition of the contract by paying £600 at Martinmas 1765 ; and when he had made payment, it was farther necessary, in order to establish the right and complete the title, that he should either obtain a charter or feu-contract, or adjudge in implement.

"The defective character of this first sasine, however, is of no importance to the validity of the pursuers' title, because it has been followed by a series of unchallenged infeftments, confirmed by successive superiors, and by uninterrupted possession. By a charter of confirmation in 1814, Thomas Hog of Newliston, who had acquired the dominium directum from Chalmers, confirmed four successive dispositions of forty of the original sixty acres, and the instruments of sasine following thereupon. The remaining twenty acres, after a series of transmissions, came into the same hands as the forty. In May 1845 the trustees of Dr Charles Durie were infeft in the whole subject ; and by charter of confirmation on the 26th of June 1856, John Buchan Hepburn, who had then acquired right to the dominium directum, confirmed to these trustees All and Whole the said sixty acres, and the instrument of sasine in their favour. Subsequent infeftments were confirmed by writs of confirmation in 1868 and 1869. There can be no doubt, therefore, of the validity of the pursuers' title, or of the feudal relation between them and the defender, who is a singular successor of Mr Buchan Hepburn.

"It is a different question whether, by virtue of their admitted title, they are in a position to enforce the obligation of relief. This obligation is recited in the writs confirmed in 1814, and also in the charter of confirmation. But it is not mentioned in the charter of 1856, in the instrument thereby confirmed, or in any of the subsequent titles. The defender maintains that he is not bound, not merely because the obligation itself is collateral and extrinsic to the feu-right, but because the contract in which it is contained is altogether personal, so that none of its obligations can be held to affect singular successors in the superiority. The answer is, that the feudal relation being in fact established, its terms, hinc inde, must be determined by the only right to which it can be traced, which is the contract of 1764. It is said that there is nothing but the contract to fix the feu-duty, and that the superior who enforces its obligations against the vassal must also accept the corresponding obligations in the vassal's favour. On the other hand, it is said that the superior does not require to go further back than the instrument of sasine and the charter of 1856, in order to ascertain the conditions of the infeftment then confirmed. It is true that this is only a charter by progress, and its terms are therefore liable to be corrected by the original tion of the obligation to relieve sought to be enforced, it was open to the pursuers to go back to the original grant which contained the obligation. No. 189.

Durie's Trustees v. Earl of Elgin.

grant. But if no original grant can be produced, there is no authority for controlling the infeftments upon which the vassal has possessed for the period of prescription, by reference to previous transmissions of the dominium utile.

"The question thus raised would be one of considerable difficulty if the pursuers' construction of the contract were clear, and if the possession had been all along in accordance with that construction. But I think the construction by no means clear; and there is nothing to shew that the obligation ever became operative even against Mr Chalmers.

"When an obligation of this kind has been embodied in a feu-contract or feu-charter, it will in general be read as a condition of the grant, and therefore available against singular successors in the superiority. But it may bear a very different construction when it is found only in a personal contract to grant a feu, because there may be stipulations in such a contract which are not intended to enter the charter as permanent conditions of the grant. In the agreement in question there are a variety of conditions, some of which are purely personal. By the obligation immediately following that in question, the superior is taken bound to enclose the subjects with a sufficient stone dyke, which is certainly personal; and a very material part of the stipulation in dispute is purely personal also, because the granter binds himself to make the public burdens a real burden upon his other lands, that is, upon lands of which the property remains in him. There is thus a personal obligation on the superior and his heirs to relieve the feuar, and to make the right of relief a real burden on their property lands, and no similar obligation to make it a burden on the superiority as such. As a question of construction, therefore, it appears to be at least very doubtful whether the condition was intended to affect singular successors in the superiority. It is not one of the essential conditions of a feu-right, and it could not be embodied in a feudal grant as a permanent condition of the right, because an essential part of the stipulation, if it were expressed in such a grant, would be altogether inapposite and ineffectual.

"But if the construction be even doubtful, it appears to me to be conclusive in favour of the defender that no grant has in fact been executed in terms of the contract. The feu-contract is to be given in return for a payment of money, and there is nothing to shew that the payment was ever made. The proper evidence that the condition had been performed upon which, according to the argument, the proprietors of the superiority were to become bound to relieve the dominium utile of public burdens, would be the production of a charter or feu-contract. If no such right were granted, the inference is that the condition was not performed. It is true that the successors of the feuar are in possession. But they have possessed under a title which, in its inception, was ineffectual to bind the superior. Their right in the lands has now come to rest upon titles which are perfectly valid, but which do not import the obligation in question.

"It is a very material consideration that the successive proprietors of the dominium utile have made no claim for relief, at all events since 1856. The defender avers that no such claim has been ever made since 1764; and although the pursuers allege that they 'believe and aver' the contrary, there is no evidence in process to shew that the alleged obligation has ever been enforced. The inference from the titles is, that no payment of relief can have been demanded from the superior for more than forty years. The result is, that there is nothing to shew that the obligation ever came into force by performance of the condition on which it became prestable. The available evidence tends to shew the contrary.

"I am therefore of opinion, upon the construction and legal effect of the titles, that the defender is not liable in the relief claimed. In this view, it is unnecessary to consider the plea of prescription, which cannot be disposed of until the fact of non-payment for forty years has been more conclusively ascertained. But assuming non-payment to be proved, I am not satisfied that the defender's plea of prescription is excluded by any of the previous decisions. In Hope v. Hope, it was held by Lord Benholme that the superiority title had been relieved

No. 189. That grant was the contract and agreement of 1764, and contained a precept of sasine upon which Drysdale had duly taken infeftment. The Lord Ordinary was of opinion that this infeftment was not valid, because the terms of the original deed did not warrant present infeftment. It was, however, clear under the old law that a precept of sasine alone would be sustained as a valid title if followed by possession, even if no charter was afterwards made out.<sup>1</sup> It was said that the contract of 1764 contained no de præsenti words. Words de præterito, however, were quite as good, for a precept of sasine gave the person holding it a present right to go to the lands to take infeftment. There was a presumption that the consideration for the granting the feu-right, viz., the £600, was duly paid, and the Lord Ordinary went too far in saying that it lay upon the vassal to shew that it was paid in order to his being allowed to take infeftment. The date of payment and the term of entry were future, but both squared with each other. There was no novelty in discriminating between one set and another set of clauses in a deed, and holding that the former was to transmit against singular successors, and the latter was not to do so. It mattered then little in this view that the clause dealing with the obligation to relieve was in suspicious proximity to the clause relating to personal services, such as enclosing the subjects with a stone dyke. The pursuers then traced the obligation back to a precept granted with as good as de præsenti words, with no qualification as to time, by one having the power to grant it, and with infeftment taken upon it after the term of entry and payment of the £600. The obligation to relieve was of a continuing character, which transmitted to heirs, and was enforceable by the vassal's singular successor against the superior without special assignation. It was the counterpart of the vassal's obligation to pay the feu-duty.<sup>2</sup> The charter of 1814 barred the superior from maintaining that the feu-duty was due, except upon the condition of the superior's affording the relief contracted for. The obligation had not been extinguished by the negative prescription.

Argued for the defender;—The obligation of relief was not binding on him. There was no mention of it in the recent renewals of the investiture, and in order to modify the existing feudal relations the pursuers were bound to shew that it was a condition of the feu. The deed of 1764, which was founded on for the sake of correcting the recent charters, was titled a "contract and agreement," and it contained no words of de præsenti conveyance. It merely contained an obligation to grant a charter on some future events. It was a personal contract to make a grant of lands on the performance of a certain condition. The grant was never made, and probably because the £600 was never paid. The infeftment then proceeding upon the contract was a bad one. Even on its terms, however, the obligation to relieve was clearly intended to be a personal obligation of a similar burden by its omission from the investiture for forty years. His Lordship's judgment was reversed by the First Division, but upon the ground that the condition as expressed in the original grant had in fact received effect. It was not decided that the negative prescription would be inapplicable, if the condition had neither been expressed in renewals of the investiture nor actually enforced."

on the superior, and was not intended to run with the lands as inter essentialia of the feu, and to be binding on his singular successors. It was not the counterpart of the reddendo at all, another remedy being provided by the superior binding himself to make these burdens real burdens on his other lands. The inference was that the obligation had nothing to do with the lands in question. Farther, the obligation had been extinguished by the negative prescription.

LORD PRESIDENT.—This action is brought by the marriage-contract trustees of Dr Andrew Durie and his wife, who are proprietors of the dominium utile of sixty acres of the Room of Drumtuthill, lying in the parish of Dunfermline and county of Fife, against the superior in the lands, to have it found and declared that the superior is “bound to free and relieve the said lands of all minister’s stipend, schoolmaster’s salary, cess, and all other public burdens in all time coming, excepting the feu-duty payable by the said lands, and also to make repetition to the pursuers of all payments they have made, or may yet make in respect of such minister’s stipend, schoolmaster’s salary, cess and public burdens since the term of Martinmas 1882, being the date at which the defender became superior of the said lands.”

The existing investiture of the lands is a writ of confirmation by John Buchan Hepburn, dated 9th June 1869, in which under the form prescribed by the Conveyancing Act of 1868 he enters these marriage-contract trustees in place of the vassal last entered, with this qualification, “only in so far as consistent with the charter of confirmation granted by me as superior foresaid in favour of Henry Black, solicitor in Edinburgh, and others, dated 26th June 1856.”

Now, this writ of confirmation really contains nothing but what I have read. There is a mere formal statement giving the names of the parties entered, and of the parties in whose place they come. The tenendas and reddendo are not given, as they are not necessary clauses under the Act of 1868. A reference back to the charter of 1856 is accordingly necessary in order to complete the terms of entry under this writ of confirmation. In short, it must be taken here that the charter of 1856 and this writ of confirmation together constitute the existing investiture of the lands.

Now, the charter of 1856 was granted by John Buchan Hepburn of Clune, then superior of the lands, and he confirms to the disponees in the deed of settlement of the late Dr Durie the sixty acres in question, and an instrument of sasine dated 21st May 1845. The tenendas and reddendo clauses are thus expressed :—“To be holden the said lands and others immediately of me and my foresaids, superiors thereof, in feu-farm, fee, and heritage for ever: Paying therefor yearly the sum of £3 sterling at the term of Martinmas, and doubling the said feu-duty the first year at the entry of every heir and singular successor, and being thirled to Meldrum’s Mill, conform as the said lands are thirled; reserving always my own right,” and so forth.

The conditions of this tenure therefore are clearly expressed in the charter of 1856. There are no qualifications or conditions except the manner of holding, the feu-duty, and the servitude.

The obligation to relieve of minister’s stipend, &c., founded on by the pursuers is not then to be found in the existing investitures of the lands; but of course if that obligation occurs in the original constitution of the holding, it would be quite competent for the vassal to go back to it and say he is not barred from insisting in the conditions of the original right, because they are omitted in the charters by progress. That is, I think, quite sound.

But then is there an original feu-right in existence, and if so what is it? That inquiry does not in the least involve the consideration whether the vassal has not a perfectly good feudal title, because he possesses under a charter by a superior, and has been in such possession for a period longer than the prescriptive period. The title to the feu is therefore unimpeachable.

The vassals, however, say they possess under the deed which is really the constitution of the original feu-right, and that it contains the obligation they here seek to enforce.

This deed is dated in 1764, and is certainly a singular document. I might almost say that it is a sort of bargain or contract such as 'one has never seen before in the history of conveyancing in this country, and I think therefore, it requires precise consideration. It sets out that "Mr George Chalmers has sold and disposed, and binds and obliges him, his heirs and successors, to grant a feu-right to the said William Drysdale, his heirs and successors, of sixty acres," and so forth, being the sixty acres of which the vassal is now in possession. The words are "has sold and disposed," which words in the ordinary forms of our conveyancing writs mean always "has already agreed to sell and dispose," but they are not followed by the dispositive words, "and hereby sells and disposes." The words which follow are "binds and obliges him, his heirs and successors, to grant a feu-right." This latter therefore he has not yet granted, but he comes under a personal obligation to do so. The lands are next described, and certain boundaries are inserted, and then the deed continues that they are "to be held in feu-farm and heritage of the said Mr George Chalmers, his heirs and successors, for yearly payment of £3 sterling at the term of Martinmas yearly, and doubling the said feu for the first year at the entry of every heir and singular successor, and being thirled to Meldrum's Mill, conform as the said lands are thirled, all lying within the pariah of Dunfermline and shire of Fife, and reserving the coal, freestone, limestone, and other minerals below ground, with liberty to win the same and to make pits, levels, coalhills, and roads for that purpose, upon paying damages above ground (the said William Drysdale always having liberty to win freestone and limestone for the uses of the farm allenary), and to assign the rents from and after the term of Martinmas 1765 for crop and for year 1766."

Now, all these provisions are governed by the original words "binds and obliges himself, his heirs and successors," and then comes the particular obligation in question, "and to free and relieve the said ground of all minister's stipend, schoolmaster's salary, cess, and all other public burdens in all time coming except the said feu-duty, and to make the said public a real burden upon his other lands; and also the said George Chalmers binds and obliges him and his forebears to enclose the said sixty acres . . . For the which causes and on the other part" on Mr Chalmers granting a feu-contract as expressed, he, the other party, "binds and obliges him, his heirs and successors, to content and pay to the said Mr George Chalmers, his heirs, executors, and successors whatsoever, the sum of £600 sterling, and that at and against the term of Martinmas 1765."

Now, all this stands upon the obligation of the granter, and there is nothing personal contract between the parties. Of course if a feu-contract had followed upon it which contained all these clauses, and Drysdale, the proposed No. 189.

vassal, had paid the sum of £600 and got delivery of the feu-contract, he would have become vassal in the lands, and the obligations of the feu-contract would have been binding on both parties. But we are bound to assume that no feucontract was ever executed, because we are shewn none, and further, that the sum of £600 was never paid. In short, this deed remains exactly what it was from the beginning to the end, a personal obligation on the one hand and on the other. There is superadded to it a precept of sasine of the purest and simplest form, and on this infestment was taken. Now, it is not easy to see with what view that precept of sasine was added to this singular deed, but certainly mere infestment upon an unqualified precept could never convert the contract in question into a valid feu-right—could not feudalise the personal obligation in the contract. That being so, it appears to me that what the vassal here refers to in order to correct the terms of the existing investiture is not only not a feu-contract, but contains only a personal obligation, and not even a personal obligation to free and relieve from minister's stipend, &c., but only to insert in a feu-contract an obligation to that effect. That is not an obligation binding on the singular successor of Chalmers, who granted it.

July 19, 1889.
Durie's Trustees v. Earl of Elgin.

The progress and history of the case is certainly against the proposition that it was ever supposed that the obligation in question was a condition of the right of property held by William Drysdale, or a condition of the superior drawing the feu-duty, because there was never any demand, so far as can be seen, from 1764 downwards, that this obligation of relief should be fulfilled. Something was attempted to be made of the charter of 1814, and it is necessary to refer to it in order to remove any confusion which seems to arise from its terms. It confirms a disposition dated 15th April 1769 granted by William Drysdale, the supposed feuar in the 1764 contract in favour of Charles Durie of Craighluscar, and also another deed by the same party in favour of the same party in corroboration of the former disposition, dated 8th April 1779, and then after setting out the lands the charter proceeds thus:—"Which lands, with the teinds and others foressaid, were sold and disposed to the said William Drysdale by the said George Chalmers by contract of sale entered into between them, dated the 5th day of June 1764, and which contains an obligation upon the said George Chalmers to free and relieve the said ground of all minister's stipend, schoolmaster's salary, cess, and all other public burdens except the feu-duty of £3 sterling therein mentioned, and to make the said public burdens a real burden upon his other lands, together with the obligation to infest a me vel de me, procuratory of resignation, precept of sasine, and other clauses contained in the said disposition."

Now, it appears pretty clear that the conveyancer who drew this charter had never seen the deed of 1764, or that if he saw it he has misunderstood it from beginning to end. In the first place, he calls it a contract of sale, which it is not. Then he says it contains an obligation on George Chalmers to free and relieve, but no mention is made of Chalmers' successors. Lastly, while he rightly says the deed contained an obligation to make the public burdens a real burden upon the other lands, he proceeds further to represent that there was contained in the deed an "obligement to infest a me vel de me, procuratory of resignation,"—[who ever heard of a procuratory of resignation in a feu-right?]"—"precept of sasine and other clauses contained in the said disposition." That is plainly a bungled title, whatever else may be said of it, and as I said before it is impossible the conveyancer who drew it can have seen the deed of 1764, or if he saw it he mis-

No. 189. understood its nature. It is not a contract of sale, it is not a disposition, and it contains no obligation to infest and no procuratory of resignation. But still further the obligation of relief is not one binding on singular successors, taking the words of the charter, because it is only an obligation on George Chalmers. It is a personal obligation on George Chalmers, the grantor of the deed, and an obligation upon him to make the public burdens a burden on his other lands, but there is nothing making it a condition of the feu-right, or a condition of the superior's being entitled to demand his feu-duty.

Durie's Trustees v. Earl of Elgin.

Therefore, while the deed of 1814 introduced a certain amount of confusion into the argument, it shews how completely the nature of the deed of 1764 was misunderstood, and it also shews, by making reference to no feu-contract, that no feu-contract ever followed upon it.

I am therefore upon the whole matter of the same opinion as the Lord Ordinary, that there is no obligation of relief such as is here sought to be established.

LORD MURE.—I agree in the result arrived at by the Lord Ordinary.

We were referred to the case of the Duke of Montrose to the effect that an obligation of relief transmitted to and was enforceable by a singular successor of the vassal against the superior, and did not require express assignation by the vassal to his heirs and disponees. But that decision proceeded on the ground that the original feu-right granted by the Duke of Montrose created an obligation in favour of the vassal, his heirs and successors, to relieve them of these burdens, and that that obligation was contained in the feu-contract itself, and constituted by infeftment following upon it. The basis of the judgment was that there was privity of contract between the superior and vassal to the effect that the latter was to be freed and relieved of these burdens in all time coming, and the obligation was held to be feudalised against the superior in the lands because it was part of the constitution of the feu-right.

In the present case the existing investiture contains no obligations of this description, and we are thrown back to the original title of the pursuer to see whether any such obligation was in the deed then granted. Now, we have not been referred to any deed of the nature of a feu-contract which contains any such obligation on the part of the superior. We have been referred to a contract containing an obligation by Chalmers to grant a feu-right, but it appears never to have been granted, probably because it was only to be granted on payment of £600, and the fact that there never was a feu-contract granted leads to the opinion that the £600 was never paid, and that the obligation of relief was never attempted to be enforced against the superior. No such obligation was ever made part of a feu-contract. The charter of 1814 cannot be said to be of that nature. Therefore nothing more in this case can be pleaded against the superior than that the original contract granted by Chalmers laid a personal obligation on him, his heirs, and successors, to free and relieve the vassal of stipend and other public burdens. Accordingly, it has never been attempted to enforce that obligation by legal proceedings since 1764, though the obligation by the terms is to relieve of public burdens in all time coming.

I therefore concur with your Lordship.

LORD SHAND.—I am not prepared to say that I have found this case altogether free from difficulty, but after giving it full consideration I have come without difficulty to be of the same opinion as your Lordships. If the document of 1764, which is certainly unique in character, had been a feu-contract containing clauses to the effect that the subjects were conveyed on condition of No. 189.

 payment of feu-duty, and with an obligation to relieve of public burdens, I should have had no doubt, after the decision to which we have been referred, July 19, 1889.
 that it would have been held that the obligation of relief was the counterpart Durie's Trustees v. Earl of Elgin. of the obligation to pay feu-duty. But the case falls far short of that.

The only case presented on behalf of the vassal is that he can shew from a series of titles that the parties agreed to accept this deed as a feu-contract, and I think that, looking to the terms of the deed, it would require a very clear statement of obligation in the later deeds to operate the result argued for by the pursuers. There is nothing in any deed to which we have been referred which does so operate. It is quite plain that when the document in question was originally granted, it was not intended to be a feu-contract regulating the rights of parties. No doubt the person who desired to have the lands desired to have infeftment, but there was no direct disposition of the lands, and when the obligations were inserted, and, among others, one of relief from public burdens, they were all subject to this undertaking to pay £600. Now, whether that sum was ever paid or not, as a matter of fact we do not know, but it may fairly be assumed that if it had been paid a feu-contract would have been granted. If it was not paid, what were the terms on which the parties arranged that the title should become permanent? We know nothing about them. If a feu-contract had been prepared the seller might, for aught we can tell, have decided to insert the clause of relief, or he might have refused to do so. Therefore, taking the document as we have it, unless it is made clear by subsequent titles that the superior treated this contract as a feu-right not merely as to the title of the vassal, but also as to the obligations inter se of the parties, the pursuers cannot succeed.

Now, we have been referred to the charter of 1814. The conveyancer who drew that deed seems to have had very imperfect knowledge of the contract of 1764, but it is to be observed that in narrating the obligation in question he does not treat it as anything but a personal obligation by Chalmers. There is no indication that he looked on it as an obligation on the heirs and successors of Chalmers in the superiority; and one might argue from that that it was probably ultimately arranged that it was not to affect persons taking the title of superior in time coming. The reference then to it for the obligation to relieve is not one which favours the view of the pursuers that the superior is liable in that obligation. The later charters also make no reference back to the conditions of the original deed.

I do not think that when a condition of this kind contained in an extraordinary deed of this sort is omitted in the subsequent charters, we can go back to the original deed to supply it. I say so for the reason that we have no original feu-charter here. In accepting this deed as the title the parties accepted it with the character it had, but I am not prepared to say that they imported all the conditions contained in it into the title, or that they intended to do so.

I am therefore of opinion that the Lord Ordinary has reached a right conclusion.

LORD ADAM.—I have no doubt at all that it is lawful to go back to the original investiture to correct an alleged omission in a charter by progress, but I am not aware that it is lawful to correct an alleged omission by reference to anything but the original investiture. It is new to me that it is possible to Trustees.

On 23d May 1889 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced this further interlocutor :—" In respect the pursuer is satisfied that the vidimus of which cannot be ascertained until the money therefor has been actually received by the executor. In such a case the accounting with the claimant for legitim must of necessity be according to the amount actually received. In the present case there was no such difficulty in the way of ascertaining the value. All the stocks of companies, except one, were quoted on the Stock Exchange, and the ship shares, although of no great value at the date of death, were still marketable. The defenders state that they endeavoured to sell the shares in the steamers and could not find a purchaser, although it is said that these have now somewhat increased in value and are saleable. This is a good reason for taking the value of the steamships, in estimating legitim, as at the present date, instead of at the small nominal value at the date of the testator's death.

"The general rule now stated rests upon this doctrine, that legitim is a claim of debt against the executry for a certain proportion of the personal estate which vests in the child claiming it at the father's death. He is entitled to that proportion and no more. If the executor delays to settle the claim, and the property sinks in value, the claim of the child is not thereby diminished, and in like manner, if it increases in value the claim is not thereby enhanced in amount. If the executor, without justifiable excuse, delays to pay the legitim, he is liable in interest, according to many decisions, and that interest is five per cent. In the case of M' Murray v. M' Murray's Trustees (17th July 1852, 14 D. 1048), the point was very distinctly brought out and determined. It was held 'that the legitim was a debt to be measured by the amount of the fund at the father's death, and did not infer a right to participate in profits realised by the application of the fund after the father's death.' The whole estate had been employed in the father's business, and profits had been made, of which the child claiming legitim demanded a share. Lord Ivory explained the grounds of judgment in the following terms :—"The claim of legitim is a claim of debt against the testator's estate. In the ordinary case of a debtor in business, the fund out of which the debt is to be paid is put in peril, but the creditor does not get the profits. In this case the pursuer's claim was a claim against the general fund, and was due at the moment of the testator's death. If the trustees have put the estate into peril, and made profit, that enlarges the estate—the measure of the creditors' security, but not of the claim—the debt is the same as before, unaffected by their trading. It is still due with interest, and nothing more. Legitim is a claim of debt. Suppose a party, thinking he has a right to dispose of his whole property, leaves all of it to one of his children and excludes another, and the child to whom the property was left enters into possession and uses the estate in trade, would that entitle the excluded child, on his claiming legitim, to claim a share of the profits? It would not, and he would not be worse off, for, if the business turned out ill, the other would be obliged, if he sacrificed the fund, to answer for it with his own funds.' In like manner, in the case of the Earl of Dalhousie v. Crokat (26th March 1868, 6 Macph. 659), the point was again submitted to the Court, although under different circumstances. A loss was sustained of the fund from which legitim was payable, in consequence of the executor having allowed his agent to embezzle it. The Court held that the executor must bear the loss, and that no part of it could be allowed to diminish the claim for legitim. 'It appears to me,' said Lord Ardmillan, 'that the child entitled to legitim is a creditor of the executor for a share of the free executry estate—that is, for a share of the free moveable estate left by the father, as at the date of his death, or as soon thereafter as it can be realised. . . . If the executor had employed the funds of the deceased in trade, the pursuer would have taken no benefit thence arising. If the executor had purchased railway or bank stock, and the stock had risen in value, I cannot think that the legitim would have been increased so as to amount to anything beyond the price paid for the stock, since, if the price had fallen, the legitim would not have been diminished. Legitim must be calculated as at the date of the father's death, and profit or loss arising after realisation, in consequence of the executor's

Gilchrist v.
Gilchrist's
Trustees.

Gilchrist's trustees reclaimed, and argued;—No exception was taken to the general rules dealing with the law of legitim as stated by the Lord Ordinary—that the value of the executry estate must be taken as at the date of the testator's death, or at least as soon thereafter as possible.<sup>1</sup> But his Lordship was wrong in not applying the same rule to the value of the ships equally with the rest of the estate, for the trustees never had mode of dealing with the funds, cannot augment or diminish the claim of the child.'

"There are cases where, in consequence of arrangements between a child claiming legitim, or a widow claiming jus relictæ, these persons will be found entitled to a share of profits made from the application of the funds to purposes of trade, and of this class of cases there is an illustration in the case of Ross v. Masson (3d February 1843, 5 D. 483). The judgment was not unanimous, as Lord Medwyn dissented, and held that there was not such a specialty as to take the case out of the general rule. It was a claim by a widow for jus relictæ, and Lord Medwyn said,—'The widow is entitled to revert to her legal rights, notwithstanding all that she has done. But then must she not take her jus relictæ according to the state of the moveables at the death of her husband? She is not tied down by the valuation then made. She may shew that this is inadequate, and she will get her share estimated at their full value. I always understood that the share of the moveable estate payable out of the estate of the husband to the children as legitim, and to the widow as jus relictæ, was estimated as at the death, and not as it might be at any future period. If the widow had claimed her jus relictæ at the time, would she have been entitled to more than the estimated value of the right according to the then rate of the market? And if by some unexpected opening of trade, or the failure of some neighbouring coal work, the value of this some years afterwards greatly increased, would she have been entitled to claim this additional value, after having obtained its value at the time of her husband's death?' Lord Moncreiff assimilated the case to a contingent fund, and upon that ground allowed the widow's claim for a share of the profits. 'If,' he said, 'the claim had been a contingent fund which could not be realised at the time of the husband's death, there is no doubt that a widow would be entitled to claim upon it as at the time when it was realised.' And this doctrine is not disputed, for the general rule allows of such an exception.

"The second point made by the pursuer is, that the whole of the stocks and shares ought to be sold in order to pay off his one-twelfth proportion. Now, there is no such absolute right on the part of a claimant for legitim or jus relictæ. This is a matter entirely in the discretion of the Court, who are entitled and bound to look to the interests of the other beneficiaries who have claims upon the estate, and if they object to such sale, the Court will give heed to such objection. To throw all these stocks and shares into the market merely to pay the pursuer's small proportion would be putting the property to the chance of loss, and would certainly be attended with very considerable expense in brokerage charges and commission. If the pursuer challenges the statement that the stocks, &c., are not entered as at the market prices of the day at the time of death, he will be allowed to prove this, but if not, he must be settled with according to that market price, seeing that if the property had been all sold he would have got no more from the sale."

any intention of selling the ships. The pursuer could not insist on a sale. He was merely a creditor for payment of legitim; he was not a beneficiary, and had no control over the administration of the fund. If a person claiming legitim could in every case insist on realisation it might lead to great hardship, e.g., in the case of a copartnership, which would have to be wound up in the case of the death of a partner against whom a claim for legitim was made. Proof should be allowed of the value of the ships as at the date of the testator's death, or within a reasonable time thereafter. It did not affect the soundness of that contention that they had as matter of fact realised the value of one of the ships within a few months after the testator's death.

The respondent argued;—The value of the ships ought to be estimated either (1) as at the present day, or (2) as at the date of litis contestatio, or (3) after the lapse of the usual period after death allowed for realisation. It was true that a person claiming payment of legitim had no control over the realisation of the estate. On the other hand, if at the date of death an asset happened to have a merely nominal value, either owing to the depression of trade or some other special circumstance, the claimant was entitled to say that he would not be put off with the nominal value, but would take his share of the asset itself in forma specifica. The right was in reality to a third or the legitima pars liberorum of the goods or gear; it was the bairns' part of gear,—a right to the thing itself pro parte,—and the claimant was entitled to the benefit of any augmentations upon the executry fund prior to realisation.<sup>1</sup> Neither party could say there had been undue delay here. Twelve months—which was an ordinary time for realisation—had barely elapsed from the death of the testator. Accordingly, it was not unreasonable that the value of the ships should be taken as at the present time.

LORD ADAM.—By the interlocutor of 23d May 1889, submitted to review, the Lord Ordinary, “in respect that the pursuer is satisfied that the vidimus, No. 10 of process, correctly sets forth the market price of the stocks and shares, other than the shares of the steamships therein mentioned, finds it unnecessary to order proof in respect thereto.”

I understand that the pursuer is still satisfied that the vidimus correctly sets forth the market price of the stocks and shares other than the shares of ships, including the sailing ship, as at the date of the truster's death, and if this be so, I think that a proof as regards the value of these shares is unnecessary.

But the Lord Ordinary further “allows the pursuer a proof of the market price at the present time of the said shares of the steamships mentioned in the vidimus.”

I do not concur in this part of the interlocutor, because I think the proof to be allowed ought to be one of the value of the ship shares as at the date of the testator's death.

The claim of legitim by the pursuer is undoubtedly a claim of debt against his father's estate, and the amount must be estimated according to the value of the estate at his death. But the defenders, his trustees, are not bound, in order to ascertain that value, to realise the estate. They may retain the whole or any part of it in forma specifica. The trustees are entitled to realise the estate or any part of it, and had they done so, the amount so realised under the deduc-tion of the expenses of the realisation would be the value of the estate of which the pursuer is entitled to a share. No. 190.

Trustees.

In this case, when the claim for legitim was intimated on 22d October 1888, no part of the estate had been realised except some shares in a sailing ship. The defenders allege that they were then, and are now, holding the estate for the benefit of the beneficiaries, and had resolved not to realise it. If that be so, it appears to me that the value of the estate must be estimated as at the date of the truster's death.

If the shares had fallen in value, the loss must have fallen on the defenders, and so if they have risen in value, they are entitled to the gain.

With reference to the value of the shares of the sailing ship which were sold on 4th September 1888, I think the question whether the pursuer is entitled to a share of the increased value depends upon the question whether or not the shares were then being held by the trustees for the beneficiaries, or were in point of fact sold with a view to realisation as at the date of the truster's death.

The Lord Ordinary recognises the general rule that the value of the estate must be estimated as at the date of the testator's death, and has given effect to it as regards all the estate except the ship shares. The defenders state (he says) that they endeavoured to sell the shares in the steamers and could not find a purchaser, although it is said that these have now somewhat increased in value and are saleable. This is a good reason (he says) for taking the value of the steamships in estimating legitim as at the present date instead of at the small nominal value as at the date of the testator's death.

While I think that the contingency of a possible or probable prospective rise in value is an element which may fairly be taken into consideration in estimating the value of the shares as at the date of the truster's death, I cannot see that the fact that the shares have increased in value since the truster's death can be a reason for taking such increased value as the value at the date of death.

I think therefore that the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor ought to be recalled.

LORD MURE.—The only question of difficulty for our decision relates to the time at which the shares in the ships ought to be valued. The note of Lord Fraser states his Lordship's opinion as to the general rule to be followed in valuing for legitim, and reference is made in it to such authorities as M'Murray's Trustees<sup>1</sup> and Panmure v. Crokat<sup>2</sup> as establishing the rule that the date of the father's death is the period for realisation. He applies the rule to the ordinary stocks and shares held by Gilchrist, but makes an exception as to the ship shares, because they did not admit of being sold at the time of the death.

Now, supposing the rule to be a fair one, that the period of death of the father is the time at which the value is to be taken, I am not able to see why a different rule should be applied to the shares in ships only because they were not at the time of Gilchrist's death capable of finding a ready market. I think that the general rule applies to them also, and though it may be more troublesome to apply it from the difficulty of selling such shares at the time of the death, still

Gilchrist v.
Trustees.

LORD SHAND.—In common, I understand, with all of your Lordships I agree that legitim is not a right to a share of the estate which entitles the claimant to have the estate realised in order that he may have the realised value of his share. It is a debt, but at the same time it is a debt to be measured by the actual value of the moveable estate left by the father at his death.

While this is so, it appears to me, however, that it would neither be safe nor proper to lay down the rule that the value is to be taken by a valuation of each article or item of the estate made as on the very day of the father's death. What a son claiming legitim is entitled to is a share of the value of the estate—that is, a share of the amount which the estate would bring if it were realised. It is true that the executors or beneficiaries are not bound to realise if they resolve and declare that they are to hold parts of the estate, and themselves to take the risk of future loss by depreciation of value and the benefit of any profit which may accrue by a rise in value. But even if such a resolution be formed and intimated, the claimant is entitled to have a share of the value which would have been received if the different items of the estate had been realised or sold. When I say that I think this value is not necessarily to be ascertained as on the very day of the death of the deceased, I mean that a share of the value of the estate as if the estate had been realised infers that the amount to be ascertained shall be as on a reasonable and prudent realisation, made with a view to gaining the best advantage—realisation such as a person having no purpose of holding for profit, but yet being anxious to make the most of the estate in its different parts or items would adopt in the ordinary administration of a deceased's estate. There are many parts of an estate which must be advertised with a view to sale, and time must elapse to admit of this, and there may be parts of an estate which it would be quite clearly imprudent as a mere question of realisation to sell without a few days or a few weeks delay. In reference to property of which this can be said I do not think that in the ordinary case the value of these is to be taken simply as the sum which could be got for them on the day of the death. If any such hard and fast rule were to be taken, what would be said of the case of a testator having shares in a company which became insolvent some days after his death, involving it might be such consequences as in the case of the City of Glasgow Bank? The claimant for legitim could not seek to have the result to the estate thrown out of view in a question with him, if prudence and due diligence has been used in the realisation; and so it appears to me that if parts of an estate realised in the ordinary course of an administration have risen in value since the day of the testator's death, the benefit should be taken into view in fixing the amount of the estate of which the legitim fund is a fixed part. In short, if the estate is to be realised as for all concerned, then the actual realisation in the ordinary course carried out with due diligence and prudence is the amount to be looked to. If executors or beneficiaries resolve to hold and not to realise, they cannot, as it seems to me, thereby diminish the legitim fund. The value of the estate as at the deceased's death should, I think, still be fixed by ascertaining in the best way possible what would have been the amount if a diligent but prudent realisation for the best advantage had actually taken place. And I must further add that where trustees or beneficiaries in answer to a claim for legitim say—it may be at a considerable interval after the testator's death—that they mean to hold particular parts of the estate for the beneficiaries, No. 190.

it appears to me that they ought not on that mere statement to be allowed to take the entire benefit of an increased value which has arisen in the in- July 19, 1889.
terval of these parts of the estate which it is in the general case to be assumed Gilchrist v.

the case would be different, but, I think, in so far as the property has risen before that resolution was formed, the additional value should be taken into view in ascertaining the value of the deceased's estate in order to fix the amount of legitim.

Now, applying these observations to the case in hand, I am not prepared to agree to a judgment in the terms which have been suggested by Lord Adam. The testator died on 14th June 1888, and I see from his settlement, which is in process, that it was a leading purpose of the deed that "my trustees shall immediately after my death, or as soon thereafter as they may deem expedient, realise my whole moveable means and estate, including my present business of wine and spirit merchant, and invest the proceeds thereof" in heritable security. We thus see that immediate realisation was one of the leading purposes of the testator. Now, six months having elapsed, the pursuer intimated his claim for legitim, and in answer the trustees intimated to him that they did not propose to realise, and did not hold the estate for that purpose.

When the pursuer's claim for legitim was made, the agent for the defenders wrote thus to his agent,—“Although our clients are averse to go on with a family litigation like this, they will have no alternative but to follow you into Court and resist the action if you will persist in proceeding; but with the view of an amicable settlement, we are instructed to offer your client, which we now do, the sum of £650 in full, but without prejudice. To enable you to judge of this offer we send you copy of the inventory of Mr Gilchrist's personal estate, and vidimus of the estate made up as at the date of the death, being the date at which the legitim fund falls to be adjusted. You will observe the sum we offer is considerably over your client's real share of the legitim fund as brought out in the statement.”

What was enclosed in this letter was a copy of the inventory for confirmation. Now, we know very well that in these inventories there is a practice of stating the value of an estate at the lowest possible figure, for the purpose of course of paying as small a duty to Government as possible. I could not find a better illustration of this than is afforded from the papers in this very case, for it appears that the defenders were willing to value the furniture at a considerably higher sum for legitim than it was valued at in the inventory given up for confirmation.

Thus, then, stood matters when this action was raised. There was no intention on the part of the beneficiaries to take over the whole estate and not to realise it. It is only when objections are stated to the vidimus made up by the defenders that we find them saying for the first time—we shall take over the whole estate as at the testator's death. By that time the value of the testator's shares in ships had risen considerably, and indeed, one of these shares had been sold at a price a good deal higher than the price stated in the inventory, and said to be the full price which could have been got on the day of the deceased's death. I take it to be clear that in a judicious administration of the estate it was desirable to hold the ship shares for a time, and to advertise them, and, if necessary, expose them for sale on more than one occasion. These shares were so advertised for realisation, and one was sold three months after the death at an advance. The defenders' proposal is that they should pay the pursuer's legitim by taking the value at the date of the death, and should keep the profit from increased values to themselves. I think that would be unreasonable. I think it must be taken that the defenders were holding for the purpose of realisation, and in any case, that the pursuer is entitled to the benefit of what would be a fair realisation, and as it is now conceded that the value of each ship had risen before the defenders intimated that they were to take over the shares, the pursuer ought to have the benefit of that rise in value.

I can only, therefore, agree with the proposed interlocutor if it will not exclude the pursuer from claiming the benefit of that increased value. If it does exclude him, I think it erroneous. I think he is entitled to his share of the estate as it stood at his father's death, but giving a fair interval for realisation, which in this case would give him a share of the profit which the defenders derive.

I agree, therefore, in holding that the Lord Ordinary was in error in sending to proof the question as to the "present value" of the shares (by which, I presume, is intended the value at the date of his Lordship's interlocutor), but I am also of opinion that the trustees ought not to be allowed to take the value as at the death of the deceased, retaining the profits which were made before intimation that they were to take over the shares. I think the interlocutor ought to be qualified with a declaration that the pursuer is entitled to the benefit of the rise which took place within six months after the death, that being a period during which the shares were held for the purpose of ordinary administration. As to the price of the share which was actually realised, there is no need for speculation, as the actual value is ascertained by the sale.

LORD PRESIDENT.—I agree in the opinion of Lord Adam. I cannot help thinking, after carefully listening to what has been said by my brother Lord Shand, that there is no substantial difference between the members of the Court on the principles upon which we are to proceed. I think that the considerations suggested by Lord Shand will arise when proof is taken as to the value of the ship shares at the death of the deceased Mr Gilchrist, and that it is unnecessary now to anticipate them.

THE COURT pronounced this interlocutor:—"Recall the interlocutor of 16th March 1889; also recall the interlocutor of 23d May 1889; and in respect the pursuer is satisfied that the vidimus, No 10 of process, correctly sets forth the market price of the stocks and shares (other than the shares of the ships therein mentioned) as at the date of the testator's death, find it unnecessary to allow a proof as to the value thereof; allow to the pursuers a proof of the value of the said shares of ships as at the date of the testator's death, and to the defenders a conjunct probation."

The case was ultimately settled.

Mackenzie v. Coulthart.

WILLIAM DALZIEL MACKENZIE of Newbie, in Dumfriesshire, had obtained interdicts against John Coulthart and others, all residing at Powfoot, in the same county, prohibiting them "from erecting or maintaining or using, during the open salmon-fishing season, stake-nets on the shores of the Solway, between high and low water-mark, on those portions of the complainers' salmon-fishery known as the Powfoot Scaur and the Howgarth Scaur." 1st DIVISION.

Mackenzie and his tenant in the fishings, William J. P. Beattie, now presented a petition and complaint against Coulthart, William Hill, and John Birnie, praying the Court "to find that the said respondents respectively, by their actings and proceedings above set forth and complained of, acted illegally, and have been guilty of a breach and violation of interdict granted by your Lordships as above set forth, and of contempt of the authority of your Lordships; and, in respect thereof, to inflict upon them such punishment, by imprisonment or otherwise, as to your Lordships shall seem necessary."

No answers were lodged, but the respondents, when they attended at the bar in compliance with an order of the Court, denied the allegations in the petition and complaint, and the Court allowed a proof to both parties.

The complainers' proof was led before Lord Adam. Proof for the respondents (who appeared for themselves) was subsequently taken on commission.

THE COURT, after hearing counsel upon the proof,<sup>1</sup> pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Find (1) that the respondent John Coulthart has broken the interdicts granted by the Second Division of the Court of Session on 1st and 3d December 1881; (2) that the respondent William Hill has broken the interdicts granted by said Division of the Court on 3d December 1881; and (3) that the respondent John Birnie has broken the interdict granted by said Division of the Court on 1st December 1881: Therefore decern and adjudge the respondents John Coulthart, William Hill, and John Birnie each to be imprisoned for the space of two months, and to be thereafter set at liberty; and for that purpose grant warrant to officers of Court to convey the said respondents from this bar to the prison of Edinburgh, thereafter to be dealt with in due course of law: Authorise the petitioners to remove the nets complained of at the expense of the respondents, and authorise execution to pass on a copy hereof certified by the Clerk of Court: Find the respondents liable in expenses," &c.

Proof—Evidence—Inspection by Court of locus after proof closed.—After the close of a proof in a Sheriff Court the Sheriff-substitute, accompanied by the agents of the parties, examined the locus of the events which were the subject of proof in order to see whether it was possible in the circumstances for certain witnesses to have seen the act to which they deponed. Having come to the conclusion that it was impossible, he gave judgment to the effect that the party who relied on their evidence had not established her case.

In an appeal, held that the Sheriff-substitute was not entitled to use his own observation of the locus as evidence to contradict the evidence of the witnesses.

2D DIVISION.
Sheriff of Renfrewshire.
I.

MARGARET HATTIE raised an action in the Sheriff Court at Paisley against William Leitch, farrier, for inlying expenses, and for aliment for an illegitimate child, of which she alleged that he was the father. She averred that on the evening of 19th August 1887 the defender had connection with her in a field. The defender denied this averment. It appeared from the proof that on 19th August the pursuer had been sent to bring the defender to see a cow which had taken ill at her master's farm. The defender returned with her, and on the way they had occasion to cross the field in question, which was of a sloping and uneven character. The pursuer adduced as witnesses two men, named Farrell and Gillespie, each of whom stated that he had separately observed the pursuer and defender on the evening in question, followed them, and standing above the place at which the alleged connection took place, had seen the act of connection, but each stated that he had not seen the other. The time they and the pursuer assigned was about 9.30 P.M.

The Sheriff-substitute (Cowan), after the proof was closed, visited the place of the alleged connection, accompanied by the agents of the parties. Thereafter he pronounced this interlocutor:—"Having heard parties' procurators and considered the proof adduced and whole process, and having also, along with the agents of parties, inspected the locus, finds in fact that the pursuer has not established that the defender is the father of her illegitimate child, to which she gave birth on 16th May 1888: Finds in law that he is entitled to absolvitor; therefore assoilzies him from the conclusions of the libel: Finds him entitled to expenses," &c.†

* Decided July 3, 1889.

† "NOTE.—This is a somewhat extraordinary case, and it is not without very careful consideration that the Sheriff-substitute has rejected the evidence led by the pursuer. If there had been any evidence of previous familiarity, or even intimacy between the parties, it would have been a somewhat awkward situation for the defender to have been where he candidly admits that he was—crossing unfrequented farm fields at half-past nine at night with the pursuer. But there is no such evidence. On the contrary, the pursuer negatives the supposition of such; and the explanation of the situation, so far as he is concerned, is simple and natural. He was summoned in haste as a veterinary to treat a cow suddenly taken with milk fever, and he went with the messenger in all haste by the shortest road. He was thus, in the exercise of his ordinary calling, led to be where he was, and all that can reasonably be said is that he may have yielded to temptation. His being where he was gave the opportunity—in itself there is nothing suspicious to make that probable. He swears distinctly that he laid no hand on the girl. She, no doubt, is as distinct to the contrary. What makes this case extraordinary is the corroborative evidence of Farrell and Gillespie adduced for the pursuer; and the Sheriff-substitute felt that it would be an advantage to see the ground in order to see whether the evidence they gave

LORD JUSTICE-CLERK.—The pursuer in this case alleges that on an occasion in August 1887 she was sent by her master from the farm on which she was working to fetch a farrier, in consequence of the illness of one of the animals in the yard, in the evening; that she went to fetch the farrier, and that he and she having to cross a field, which was the shortest cut to the farm, he took advantage of her, and in consequence of the connection which then took place was possible. It did at first appear to him as very extraordinary, not that one, but that two men, totally separated and independent, should at that hour of night have had their attention attracted by the parties, and following them, have stood over them and seen the alleged act. He still thinks that the pursuer's case would have received greater support if only one such witness had come forward. That two should be found seems to him exceedingly unlikely and improbable. Taking first the evidence of Farrell, he was sitting on a rock playing a concertina when he saw distinctly the parties leave the Crossleehill Road and come towards him; they passed close to where he had concealed himself among whins, and then recognising them, he got up and went after them and followed them to the march-dyke, where he stood above them, again among whins, and watched the act. Now, there are rocks and whins which would make all this possible; in particular, there is, just above the place where the parties must have crossed the march-dyke, a whin-clad, rocky mound from which they could be overlooked. It may be doubted whether, looking down into the shadow of the dyke at half-past nine o'clock, the witness could have seen what he says he saw; it may still more be doubted whether in that light he could, sitting on his first rock, have seen the parties leave the Crossleehill Road, that rock being the breadth of two fields distant. And it is to be observed in his evidence that his statement that they came towards him, the man having his arm round the girl's waist, is quite opposed to the pursuer's own story of what took place; that in cross-examination he wavers as to which side of the march-dyke the connection took place upon; and that he says in cross-examination that he came off the Crossleehill Road into the field where the connection took place, and it would rather seem from what he says that the parties "came into that field" where he already was, a statement totally at variance with his first statement that he followed them. He finally, however, posts himself on the whin-clad knoll already referred to. Now, what account does Gillespie give of himself? He was on the Crossleehill Road, and seeing the parties leave it about ten yards short of where he was, he took to the fields and followed them. He did not take the same route, but took the high side of the field, and then rounded upon them, and stood for ten minutes looking on. The fields about Crossleehill farm slope continuously down, and there is no room for dubiety that the high side of the fields was that nearest the Crossleehill Road, and there is no other spot to which Gillespie's detour could have brought him when he rounded on the parties than Farrell's whin-clad knoll. Gillespie does not say, as Farrell does, that he was in the same field as the parties were. But if connection did take place where the pursuer says it did, it was on the Crossleehill side of the march-dyke, and the dyke being what it is—a somewhat high stone dyke—Gillespie must have been on the same side of the dyke. The inevitable conclusion is that Farrell and he must have been standing within a yard or two of each other, if not side by side; there is no other spot of vantage where the men who saw what each says he saw could have been stationed. And yet neither the one nor the other saw the other! The Sheriff-substitute unhesitatingly rejects their evidence. He thinks it unnecessary to go further into the evidence. He believes the defender, and he does not believe the pursuer."

between them she has had a child. The case has this peculiar feature about it that there are two men who swear that, without either of them knowing that the other was there, they actually witnessed what took place. But in the first place, let us see what is the case of the woman herself, how she behaved, because if her conduct at the time or about the time and since had been in any way unsatisfactory or had led to any doubt, it would have been unnecessary to consider the evidence of these two witnesses at all. Now, I have considered the case with some care as regards her deposition and the evidence of the witnesses with whom she came in contact after the occasion in question, and I see no reason to doubt the truthfulness of her evidence, or to doubt the statements which she makes as to the course which was followed by her immediately after and at the subsequent time when she announced that she was in the family-way. It is a little remarkable in this case that the first indication by the pursuer of anything having taken place is not volunteered by her, but is brought out of her by the question of a woman to whom she went that night, after the farrier had come across, to get some medicine for the cow that was ill, because Mrs Hester M'Kechnie or Laird gives this account of it,—“She seemed excited, and I asked her what was wrong with her. She then told me that William Leitch had been meddling with her.” Now, that occurs on the very night and probably within an hour of the time at which she and Leitch were in company together; and having given that account, drawn from her by the question of this Mrs Laird in consequence of observing that something was wrong with her, she has adhered to that from first to last; and I say that in itself I see no reason to doubt her testimony, and in so far as it can be confirmed by an early disclosure by her, it certainly is confirmed. Whether that would have been quite enough to satisfy the Court that the pursuer had proved her case, I do not say. I think possibly it might.

But then comes in the question, whether the evidence of the two persons who allege that they saw the man engaged in having connection with this woman is to be held to be absolutely perjured evidence,—for it is either true or perjured; there is no question about that. Now, in this case the Sheriff-substitute has adopted a course which I think is most extraordinary and most reprehensible, because, after hearing the evidence of the witnesses, he goes to the spot without the witnesses to explain to him what they meant by their evidence, which he had taken without having seen the place. He goes without the witnesses to the place in order that, taking their evidence in his hand, he may form some opinion of his own as to whether they could have seen or did see what they alleged. In so doing, I think that the Sheriff is just turning himself into a witness in the case. He gives himself testimony by going there to look at the ground after the evidence had been led and in order to enable him to form his opinion, and what is the result of that?—that we, who cannot go and see the ground, are to rely upon evidence which he has given without cross-examination as to the possibility or impossibility of particular things being done and witnessed according to his view of the evidence which he had previously heard. That is not at all a satisfactory way of dealing with such a matter. The witnesses who gave their evidence at the trial gave their evidence, so far as one can judge, frankly and straightforwardly. I think it would be very easy, in almost any case where a witness gave evidence in Court in reference to something that happened when people were crossing fields where there were hedges and walls and so on, for a person who heard the evidence to go afterwards, and, without having pointed out to him the exact spots to which the witnesses alluded, or without cross-examination having taken place of those persons in reference to the exact localities, to find out that there might be difficulties about their evidence; but these difficulties might all be explained if the evidence was taken after the Sheriff had gone to look at the ground, which is the proper course in all cases in which a Judge is going to give his opinion upon evidence as a jury and thinks it desirable to see the ground,—that is, for the purpose of understanding the evidence afterwards to be led—not for the purpose of criticising evidence which has been already led. We all understand the advantage in some cases of what is called a view; but it would be the most unsatisfactory thing possible that, after all the evidence has been led in a case, the Judge should go by himself and turn himself into a witness, and examine localities without the opportunity of any explanation on the part of witnesses who had given evidence, and form his opinion as to whether certain things were possible or not. And therefore, my Lords, I discard altogether the views of the Sheriff-substitute based upon what he himself saw after the proof had been led and without any opportunity on the part of witnesses for explanation.

Now, that being so, I am driven to the conclusion that I see no ground for thinking that these witnesses have committed wilful perjury. It is certainly a remarkable circumstance, and one which requires to be considered in a case of this kind as very remarkable, that two separate witnesses going about the fields should happen to witness an act of this kind; but can one say it is so absolutely improbable that, without any other ground for doing so, the witnesses who swear they saw the thing done are to be held to have committed perjury? If one man had been the witness, then there would have been no ground for imputing perjury to him unless there was something suspicious in the way he gave his evidence; and is it so improbable that two men should have happened to have the means of observing the same thing that we are to hold they have both committed perjury? I can see no ground for doing so; and upon the whole matter I have come to the conclusion that the pursuer has made out her case. It is not a thing to be done lightly, of course, to alter the judgment of the Sheriff and Sheriff-substitute in a matter of this kind; but I think we are placed in a very embarrassing position here by the course which the Sheriff-substitute has taken, and that really the true course for us to take in this case is to consider the evidence regardless of the fact how the judgment has gone in the past at all, and to consider it as if it came up before us as a new case altogether. Considering it in that light, so far as I am able to do so, I have come to the conclusion that the pursuer has made out her case.

 upon a policy or policies any sum or sums exceeding the amount authorised by his mandate." It was further provided (13),—"Intimation of the admission of new members shall be given on the board" [in the underwriters' room], "and remain there ten days after their admission, and in the case of an underwriter it shall express the maximum sum to be taken by him on each risk by a named ship."

It was the practice of the Admission Committee to inquire into the financial position of applicants, and in certain cases they required guarantees. The bye-laws contained no reference to guarantees.

In February 1871, Mr James A. Birrell was admitted to the association as an underwriter authorised to underwrite to the extent of £100. The following guarantee was granted by the firm of Wingate, Birrell, & Company:—"24th February 1871.—David McCowan, Esq., secretary, Association of Underwriters.—Dear Sir,—We beg to intimate to you that we guarantee the liabilities arising on the account of Mr James A. Birrell underwritten by us in his name.—We are, Sir, yours respectfully, WIN-GATE, BIRRELL, & COMPANY."

On 2d June 1879, a similar letter was granted by the same firm, when James A. Birrell's limit was extended to £200.

In April 1888, the estates of the then existing firm of Wingate, Birrell, & Company, and of Walter Birrell and James A. Birrell, the individual partners, were sequestrated.

Messrs Rose, Murison, & Thomson, insurance brokers, Glasgow, and members of the association, claimed to be ranked as creditors under the guarantees for losses covered by policies underwritten by James A. Birrell, and endorsed to them in trust for the owners.

The trustee rejected the claim.

Rose, Murison, & Thomson, with concurrence of the association, appealed, and a record was made up.

The appellants, inter alia, averred that had it not been for the guarantees business would not have been given to the underwriter, "and the public, the brokers who effected policies, and the association, relied, as they were entitled to do, upon the guarantees being fulfilled."

The appellants pleaded;—(1) In respect of the guarantees condescended on, et separatim, in respect of said guarantees and the usage of the Glasgow Underwriters' Insurance Room, the appellants are entitled to rank in terms of their claim. (3) The bankrupt firm having taken over the assets and liabilities of the preceding firms, is liable for said guarantees.

The trustee pleaded;—(3) The appellants have no right or title to found on the alleged guarantees. (6) The appellants not having known of any of the alleged guarantees prior to the date of sequestration, are not entitled to found thereon. (8) The appeal should be refused, in respect none of the guarantees are in favour of the appellants.

The Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) allowed a proof. Mr Rundell, secretary to the association, gave evidence to the following effect:—"Applicants for admission as underwriters apply through a broker, and on my receiving his letter of application I call a meeting of the committee, and I appoint two of them as inquirers. In the application there are two referees named, upon whom the inquirers call to get information as to whether the applicant is in such a position, financially, as to qualify him to be an underwriter. Then at the meeting of committee the inquirers give in their report, and on that report the committee take the application into consideration, and accept or reject the proposed underwriter. That is the procedure adopted in every case where a new member is proposed for the Room. In some cases the committee ask a guarantee, where they consider that the financial position of the applicant is such that they would desire some outside security. For instance, the money of the applicant may be locked up and not immediately available. These guarantees are granted in my favour as secretary, and are held by me. In some cases they are indorsed on the mandate. If the underwriter is guaranteed by some person outside, not a broker, then the guarantee is generally indorsed on the mandate held by the broker, and I do not hold it; but when a broker guarantees the underwriter, I receive and keep the letter. When the guarantee is written on the mandate, the mandate is exhibited to me and I satisfy myself as to the sufficiency of the guarantee. The mandate is obliged to be produced to me to shew that the broker is entitled to underwrite. Those guarantees that are indorsed upon the mandates are in general terms, and are considered and approved of by the Admission Committee. Since the institution of the Admission Committee in 1856 about twenty-two per cent of the underwriters admitted were guaranteed. . . . It was generally known in the Room that the Admission Committee would take a guarantee if necessary. It might or might not be known in the Room that guarantees had been granted for certain underwriters. The practice was known in the Room, and it was open for any member to make inquiry whether a guarantee existed or not, and I answered it. The guarantees were entered in the Admission Committee's book, which is quite open to the members. . . . In practice all underwriting is done through brokers, the broker having a set of underwriters for whom he acts and from whom he has mandates. It is the practice for the broker to select his men from the members of the Room, though sometimes he goes outside. He can come in and tender any underwriter he likes, the responsibility being with him. There is no rule against his going outside, but the practice is to select from the inside first. He knows that the Admission Committee have made investigation as to the solvency of the underwriters who are members of the Room. That is the reason why he selects from among them in the first instance—to satisfy his client. That is one

Is it, in your view, in the interest of the association to enforce these guarantees for the benefit of the assured? (A.) I think, for keeping up the dignity and credit of the association, it is the proper thing to do."

Rose, Murison,
& Thomson v.
Wingate, Birrell,
& Co.'s
Trustee.

On 17th July 1889 the Lord Ordinary (Kyllachy) pronounced the following interlocutor:—"Finds the appellants are entitled to be ranked on the sequestrated estates of Wingate, Birrell, & Company, and individual partners of said company, mentioned in the note of appeal, for the sums due under the policies held by the appellants, so far as underwritten by (1) J. A. Birrell, . . . ."

* "OPINION.— . . . The claim is made by the appellants in conjunction with the Underwriters' Association and their secretary, Mr Rundell, and it is founded on certain letters granted by the sequestrated firm or its predecessors in business trading under the same name, whereby the firm is said to have guaranteed due payment of the underwriting accounts of the four persons mentioned, and to have done so to the Underwriters' Association for the benefit of the pursuers and other members of the association, who became creditors in the said underwriting account.

"It may be explained that the Glasgow Underwriters' Association is a body composed of brokers and underwriters, the members of which have to a large extent the monopoly of the marine insurance business in Glasgow. They meet daily in a room called the 'Underwriters'-room.' They are governed by a set of bye-laws (of which No. 21 of process is a copy), and as a rule they only do business with each other, no underwriters being accepted for any risk who have not been admitted members of the association. There is a committee of admission, whose business it is to see to the financial soundness of any person applying for admission, and if the committee are not otherwise satisfied on that point, it is their practice to require a guarantee, which is sometimes granted by outsiders and sometimes, and more generally, by the brokers who are to act for the applicant, and who hold his mandate for that purpose.

"The procedure connected with the granting of the guarantees, and the manner in which their existence is made known to the members, is fully explained in the evidence of Mr Rundell, and I need not further refer to it. It is enough that it sufficiently appears that while the policies underwritten by guaranteed members do not bear any reference to the guarantees, the evidence shews that such policies are accepted, if not always in knowledge of and in reliance on the guarantees, yet always in reliance on the fact that all underwriters admitted have to satisfy the committee by guarantee or otherwise of their ability to fulfil their engagements.

"The first question which arises, in these circumstances, is whether the appellants (or whether the appellants suing along with the association and its secretary) have a title to enforce the guarantees in question granted by Wingate, Birrell, & Company for the several underwriters referred to.

"On this question it was maintained for the respondent that the appellants had no title, and the association had no interest to enforce such guarantees, that the same were not operative as obligations, and were not intended to be so, but were mere tests of the estimation in which the entrant's guarantee stood, or at best mere obligations in honour, which, if granted by members of the Room, carried with them a sufficient moral sanction. They referred to Peddie v. Brown, 3 Macq. 65, Fennie v. The Glasgow and South-Western Railway Company, 3 Macq. 75, Blumer v. Scott, 1 R. 379.

"The appellants on the other hand maintained that these guarantees must be held to have been exacted by the committee of the association in the interests of the assured, and with a view to enforcement on their account, and that this gave the assured a sufficient jus quæsitum under the policies on which they could sue or claim. But they further maintained that all difficulty on this score was obviated by the concurrence in the present claim of the association and its secretary, who, having taken the guarantees, have necessarily a title to enforce them, and have also a sufficient interest in this respect that they owe a responsibility to the assured as having admitted the underwriters, and must suffer as an association by their members' default in obligations undertaken in the Room, and to brokers who are members of the association. They referred to Smith's Leading Cases, 9th edn. i. 586 ; Addison on Contracts, p. 24, 8th edn. ; Humphreys v. Dale, 7 E. and B. 206 ; Fleet v. Martin, 7 Q. B. 126. No. 193.

Rose, Murison,
& Thomson v.
Wingate, Birrell, & Co.'s
Trustees.

"My opinion in this matter is with the appellants. I think that both on principle and authority persons assuring through brokers who are members of the association have a jus quæsitum in these guarantees which gives them a title to sue upon them. The test, I admit, is whether the association and the guarantors could, during the currency of the risks underwritten, agree between them to discharge the guarantees. In my opinion they could not. I, at the same time, consider that the concurrence of the association is not without importance—as at least relieving the appellants of any technical difficulty which might otherwise attach to their position. . . ."

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE. Oath.

Administration of oath—Latent objection. Blair v. North British and Mercantile Insurance Co., Jan. 8, 1889, p. 325.

AGENT AND CLIENT. Trust—Liability of agent.

1. Held that it was no part of the duty of a law-agent appointed to be factor and law-agent to the trustees under a trust-disposition and settlement to volunteer his advice to the trustees that a loan made by the testator on personal security was not such an investment of the trust funds as they were entitled to retain, and that therefore he was not liable for loss resulting from their retaining the investment. Curror v. Walker's Trustees, Jan. 25, 1889, p. 355.

2. Beneficiaries held not entitled to sue the law-agents to the trust for damages for improper investment of trust funds, on the ground that the beneficiaries had not employed the law-agents. Rae v. Meek, August 8, 1889, H. L., p. 31.

Double agency.

3. Bank-agent also agent for customer of the bank. Couper's Trustees v. National Bank of Scotland, Limited, Feb. 6, 1889, p. 412.

4. Reduction of antenuptial contract by widow on the ground that the notary who executed the deed on her behalf was her husband's law-agent. Lang's Trustees v. Lang, March 15, 1889, p. 590.

See Reparation, 22.

AGENT AND PRINCIPAL. Trust for creditors—Responsibility of trustee.

A trader in embarrassed circumstances conveyed to one of his creditors his whole estates and business in trust for behoof of the grantor and his creditors, the trustee to have the management of the business, and the truster to act as his submanager, and to receive such weekly allowance as the trustee should think proper, the business to be carried on by the trustee till he should think it expedient to restore it to the truster or to sell it. The business was carried on for twenty years by the truster under supervision of the trustee, the supplies being ordered by the truster and paid for by cheques drawn by the trustee upon a bank account in his name into which the drawings were paid. The trustee gave the truster a cheque for £6 monthly for his support. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that the trustee was personally liable for goods supplied to the business, on the ground that it was carried on by him under the trust-deed, and that the truster had acted as his manager. Ford & Sons v. Stephenson, Oct. 25, 1888, p. 24.

APPEAL (HOUSE OF LORDS). Leave to appeal—Interlocutory judgment.

1. Circumstances in which the Court refused a petition for leave to appeal to the House of Lords against an interlocutor which did not exhaust the whole conclusions of the action. Stewart v. Kennedy, Feb. 26, 1889, p. 521.

Jury trial—Interlocutor approving issue—Appeal to House of Lords with view to obtaining second issue—Court of Session Act, 1850, sec. 13.

2. In an action of reduction of missives of sale of a landed estate the pursuer proposed issues of facility and circumvention, and of essential error. The Lord Ordinary appointed the issue of facility and circumvention to be "the issue for the trial of the cause." On a reclaiming note the Court adhered, Lord Shand dissenting on the ground that the pursuer was entitled to both issues. The pursuer having appealed to the House of Lords, the defender moved the Court to allow the cause to go to a jury on the issue as adjusted, on the ground that the question whether the second issue should be granted was not "necessarily dependent" on the interlocutor appealed against within the meaning of sec. 13 of the Court of Session Act, 1850. The Court refused the motion, the Lord President and Lord Adam doubting whether a trial pending appeal would be competent. Stewart v. Kennedy, June 29, 1889, p. 890.

Appeal from Sheriff Court. See Process, 20, 21, 22, 23.

Appeal to Court of Justiciary. See Justiciary Cases, 1, 2, 3.

ARBITRATION. Arbitrator—Disqualification.

1. The arbitration clause in a contract for the making of a railway provided that the arbitrator should not be disqualified from acting by being or becoming consulting engineer to the railway company. Held that he was not barred from acting as arbitrator by the fact that he had revised the specifications and schedules upon which the work which formed the subject of the arbitration was performed. Adams v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co., June 21, 1889, p. 843.

Decree-arbitral—Reduction.

2. By the arbitration clause in a contract for the making of a railway, it was provided that "all disputes and differences which have arisen or shall or may arise between the parties under or in reference to this contract, or in regard to the true intent, meaning, and construction of the same, or of the said specifications, conditions, and schedules, or as to what shall be considered carrying out the work in a proper, uniform, and regular manner, . . . or as to any other matter connected with, or arising out of, this contract, and generally all disputes and differences in any way connected with the construction of this contract, or arising out of the execution or failure to execute properly the works hereby contracted for or not," should be submitted and referred to the final sentence and decree-arbitral of the arbitrator named. Held that, as the whole matter, including the construction of the contract, had been referred to the arbitrator, the Act of Regulations prevented the Court from interfering with the arbitrator's award, even on the ground of injustice. Adams v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co., June 21, 1889, p. 843.
3. In a reduction of a decree-arbitral on the ground that the arbitrator had given decree for a larger sum in name of penalties than was claimed by the party in whose favour decree was granted, the latter offered to discharge the excess. Held that the proper remedy was to reduce the decree quoad the excess. Adams v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co., June 21, 1889, p. 843.

ARRESTMENT. Foreign—English decree for costs—Charging order.

A on the dependence of an action against B arrested in the hands of C a sum due by him to B under a decree for costs in an English action. B's English solicitors subsequently obtained a "charging order" from the English Court, which by the law of England had the effect not only of transferring B's right to them, but of invalidating any prior attachments of the fund by his creditors. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Kinnear) that the claim of the English solicitors was preferable to that of A. Stewart v. North, July 5, 1889, p. 927.

See Jurisdiction, 1, 2, 3—Ship, 6.

BANK. Current account—Initialing of entries by bank-agent.

1. Entries in a customer's bank pass-book of sums paid into the bank, duly initialed by a bank official, are prima facie evidence against the bank that the money has been paid in. Couper's Trustees v. National Bank of Scotland, Limited, Feb. 6, 1889, p. 412.

Bank-agent also agent for customer of bank—Fraud—Liability for loss.

2. The law-agent and factor of a trust was also agent of a branch bank with which the trustees had a current account, and was authorised by them to operate on the account. After some years he absconded. It was then found that four entries in the trustees' pass-book of sums paid in had no corresponding entries in the bank ledger. All the entries in the pass-book were initialed by the agent himself, and not by the bank teller, as was the usual course with such entries, and two of the four entries had also the forged initials of the bank cheque clerk. The other two, like the rest of the entries, had only the initials of the agent, who kept the pass-book in his own custody. The agent had also annually signed docquets in the bank ledger as "factor," certifying the correctness of the balance as appearing in the bank ledger. In an action by the trustees against the bank for payment of the sums as entered in their pass-book, held that the money had never been paid into the bank, and consequently that the bank were not liable. Couper's Trustees v. National Bank of Scotland, Limited, Feb. 6, 1889, p. 412.

BANKRUPTCY. Constitution of bankruptcy—Notour bankruptcy—Cessio bonorum—Insolvency—Expiry of charge on undisputed debt—Debtors Act, 1880, sec. 9.

1. Held that where in a petition for cessio there is produced an expired charge on an undisputed debt, neither paid nor offered to be paid, a presumption of insolvency is raised, and that therefore prima facie evidence of notour bankruptcy, within the meaning of section 9 of the Debtors Act, 1880, is established.

Observed that "insolvency" means, in the sense of the Act, present inability to pay a debt due. M'Nab v. Clarke, March 16, 1889, p. 610.

Effect of bankruptcy—Security—Prior debt—Act 1696, cap. 5—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 110.

2. Held that the securities which are struck at by the Act 1696, cap. 5, and the 110th section of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, are securities created by some act or deed of the bankrupt or deceased debtor, and that these provisions do not apply where it is the creditor who has rendered the securities effectual. Scottish Provident Institution v. Cohen & Co., Nov. 20, 1888, p. 112.

Effect of bankruptcy—Illegal preference—Deed of arrangement—Right to challenge.

3. Held that a deed of arrangement in a sequestration conveying the sequestrated estates to a purchaser does not carry a right to challenge illegal preferences. Smith & Co. v. Smyth, Feb. 5, 1889, p. 392.

Effect of bankruptcy—Illegal preference—Act 1696, cap. 5.

4. A firm, within sixty days of their sequestration, assigned their book debts to the amount of £387, 15s., in security of an immediate advance of £330, and in exchange for a bill for £57, 15s. previously granted by them to the assignee.

Question whether this assignation was struck at by the Act 1696, cap. 5, to the extent of the £57, 15s.

Opinion per Lord Young that it was not. Smith & Co. v. Smyth, Feb. 5, 1889, p. 392.

Effect of bankruptcy—Illegal preference—Act 1696, cap. 5.

5. A, being indebted to B, granted along with a friend C, a promissory-note to B for the amount of the debt. Of the same date A disposed in favour of C certain heritable subjects by disposition ex facie absolute, but by back-letter declared to be in security merely of C if he should be called to pay under the promissory-note. A was sequestrated within sixty days of this transaction. The trustee in the sequestration brought a reduction of the disposition on the ground that it conferred a preference on B indirectly, in contravention of the Act 1696, cap. 5, but did not conclude for reduction of the promissory-note, nor call B as a defender. Held (diss. Lord Lee) that looking to the transaction between A and C alone there was no ground for reduction under the Act 1696, as C was not a prior creditor of A, and that as B was not called as a party to the action the transaction as a whole could not be considered. The defender was therefore assolvizid. McDougall's Trustees v. Gibbon, June 4, 1889, p. 740.

Sequestration—Trustee—Appointment of new trustee—Nobile Officium.

6. Where a bankrupt and the trustee in his sequestration had both died,—neither having been discharged,—and there remained, more than eighty years after the sequestration, certain funds for distribution, the Court, on the petition of the representatives of one of the commissioners, remitted to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to appoint a meeting of creditors to be held for the election of a new trustee. Young, Nov. 13, 1888, p. 92.

Sequestration—Trustee—Discharge—Radical right of bankrupt—Title to sue.

7. Where the trustee in a sequestration has been discharged, and no other trustee has been appointed, the bankrupt, although not reinvested, has in virtue of his radical right a good title to sue for behoof of his estate. Whyte v. Murray, Nov. 16, 1888, p. 95.

Sequestration—Trustee—Discharge of both trustee and bankrupt—Appointment of new trustee—Abandonment of claim.

8. Certain creditors upon a sequestrated estate on which both the trustee and the bankrupt had been discharged, the latter without composition, presented a petition for a remit to the Lord Ordinary on the Bills to appoint a meeting of creditors for the election of a new trustee, averring that there were funds belonging to the sequestrated estate which had not been recovered, and that the petitioners had not been paid their debts in full. It was objected that all claim to these funds had been abandoned by the trustee. Objection repelled, and petition granted. Northern Heritable Securities Investment Co., Limited, v. Whyte, Nov. 21, 1888, p. 100.

Sequestration—Recall—Affidavit—Specification of securities—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 22.

9. A advanced a sum of £4300, for the purpose of carrying on a limited company, and by bond he took the company and its six directors, of whom he was one, bound to repay the loan. Thereafter A charged B, one of the six co-obligants, to refund the £4300, under deduction of one-sixth part for which he (A) was liable, and the charge having expired without payment, A thereupon obtained sequestration of B's estates. A's affidavit, produced along with the petition for sequestration, set forth the amount (£3583, 6s. 8d.) of the debt and the names of the company and of the other five directors as co-obligants. It did not mention an inhibition which A had used against B, but which was admittedly valueless, and had attached nothing. A petition by B for recall of the sequestration was thereupon presented, founding upon the 22d section of the Bankruptcy (Scotland) Act, 1856, on the grounds (1) that the affidavit did not state that he himself was liable as a co-obligant for the whole debt; and (2) that it failed to specify a security held by A over the bankrupt estate. The Court repelled the first objection, and, as regarded the second, held that as the objection was one which did not appear ex facie of the proceedings, they had a discretion as to recalling the sequestration, and that in the present case there was no ground for recalling it. Mitchell v. Motherwell, Nov. 22, 1888, p. 122.

Sequestration—Recall—Affidavit—Administration of oath to petitioning creditor—Latent objection—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 22.

10. The affidavit produced with a petition for sequestration bore that the petitioning creditor appeared before a Justice of the Peace named, and, "being solemnly sworn and interrogated, deposed" to the amount of the debt, &c., and concluded with the words "all which is truth, as the deponent shall answer to God," and bore the signature of the deponent and of the Justice. In a petition by the bankrupt for recall of the sequestration (which was opposed only by the petitioning creditor) on the ground that the affidavit was invalid by reason of the granter not having been put on oath, it was proved that though the creditor had signed the affidavit in presence of the Justice he had not been put on oath, but had merely, in answer to a question by the Justice, stated that what was set forth in the affidavit was true. The Court recalled the sequestration, holding (1) that the affidavit was invalid, and (2) that the objection to the affidavit, though latent, should in the circumstances be sustained, as it had not been shewn that the recall would be prejudicial to other creditors. Blair v. North British and Mercantile Insurance Co., Jan. 8, 1889, p. 325.

Sequestration—Recall—Affidavit—Verity of debt—Constitution anew of notour bankruptcy on same debt after four months—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, secs. 9, 15, and 22.

11. A debtor was charged in July 1888 by the assignees to a debt to make payment thereof. On failure to pay, his estates were sequestered, but in January 1889 the sequestration was recalled in respect of an informality in the oath of the petitioning creditor. On 17th January he was charged of new on the same debt, and on his failure to pay the creditor again petitioned for sequestration. The oath produced with the petition bore that the debtor "was justly indebted and resting owing" to the creditor the amount of the debt, and that "no part of said sum has been paid or compensated." Sequestration having been awarded, the debtor petitioned for recall on the grounds (1) that the oath was disconform to the requirements of section 22 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1856, in respect it did not set forth in terms that the debt had not been paid either to the cedent or to the assignee, and (2) that the petition for sequestration was incompetent under sections 9 and 15 of the Act, in respect it was presented more than four months from the commencement of notour bankruptcy in July 1888. The Court refused the prayer of the petition. Blair v. North British and Mercantile Insurance Co., July 10, 1889, p. 947.

Sequestration—Compromise approved by general body of creditors—Bankruptcy Act, 1856, sec. 169.

12. A trustee in a sequestration entered into a compromise with a debtor to the estate, whereby he waived certain claims against the debtor on payment of a certain sum, and the debtor waived claims of retention, which, if sustained, would have extinguished the trustee's claim. At a meeting of creditors a resolution was passed approving the compromise. A creditor appealed against that resolution, and prayed the Court to ordain the trustee to grant his consent, as concurring pursuer, to an action which he proposed to raise against the debtor for the full amount of his debt, the appellant guaranteeing the expense of the proposed action. The Court refused the appeal, on the ground that the re-opening of the question settled by the compromise might result in loss to the estate. Marshall & Aitken v. Campbell's Trustee, July 2, 1889, p. 895.

Sequestration—Catholic and secondary creditors—First and second bondholder—Poinding of the ground.

13. The holder of a first bond over heritable subjects, who had by poinding the ground obtained a preference over his debtor's moveables to the extent of £122 (of interest), after obtaining payment of his bond by realising the heritage, assigned his preference over the moveables to the holder of a second bond. In a question between the trustee on the debtor's sequestered estate and the holder of the second bond, held that the holder of the first bond was bound as far as possible to take payment from the moveables or to assign his preference over them to the second bondholder, and that having taken payment entirely from the heritage the second bondholder had right to his preference over the moveables. Nicol's Trustee v. Hill, Feb. 8, 1889, p. 416.

BANKRUPTCY—Continued.

Sequestration—Company—Bankrupt shareholder—Discharge on composition and reinvestiture—Liability for subsequent calls on shares.

14. A shareholder in a limited company, the shares of which were only partly paid up, was sequestrated, but in 1885 was discharged, on payment of a composition "of all debts and obligations contracted by him, or for which he was liable at the date of the sequestration," and reinvested in his estate. The company did not claim in the sequestration. In 1887 the shareholder, for the first time, requested the company to remove his name from their register, on the ground that his estates had been sequestrated, but the company refused to do so, and subsequently made a call upon him in respect of his shares. In a petition at his instance to have his name removed from the register on the ground that the amount unpaid on his shares was a debt for which he was liable at the date of his sequestration, the Court refused the prayer. Taylor v. Union Heritable Securities Co., Limited, June 1, 1889, p. 711.

15. A creditor of a bankrupt gave notice to him that he was about to present a petition for cessio. The day after the notice was given the bankrupt granted a trust-deed for behoof of his creditors in favour of a person who had been trustee under a previous trust-deed, and to whom he knew the creditor would object. The Sheriff refused decree of cessio on the ground that the estate was almost realised under the trust-deed. The Court, in the circumstances, sustained an appeal at the instance of the petitioner, and remitted to the Sheriff to grant decree of cessio. Robertson & Sons v. Falconer, Dec. 15, 1888, p. 235.

16. In a creditor's petition for cessio the debtor was cited to appear for examination on 28th February 1888. At the diet the Sheriff, on the petitioning creditor's motion, adjourned the diet to 16th March 1888, "in respect that there was a prospect of an arrangement being come to." The debtor was not present at the diet, and the adjourned diet was not intimated to him. Disputes having arisen as to a trust-deed, the creditor at the adjourned diet moved the Sheriff to grant decree of cessio, and the Sheriff, "in respect of no appearance by or for the defender," granted decree. Held that as notice of the diet had not been given to the debtor, the decree was disconform to the above statute, and fell to be reduced. Reid v. Somerville & Co., June 6, 1889, p. 751.

17. The emoluments of an assistant and successor to a parish minister amounted to £100 a-year. He applied for cessio, his debts being £1100. Held that he was entitled to the benefit of cessio on his assigning £20 a-year to his creditors. Simpson v. Jack, Nov. 23, 1888, p. 131.

Cessio bonorum—Trustee—Vesting of estate—Poinding—Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 26.

18. A Sheriff having refused to a poinding creditor a warrant to sell under sec. 26 of the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, on the ground that the debtor had applied for the benefit of cessio, the creditor appealed under sec. 65 of the Court of Session Act, 1868. Held that the creditor was entitled to a warrant of sale. Simpson v. Jack, Nov. 23, 1888, p. 131.

Trust for creditors—Responsibility of trustee who carries on business—Principal and Agent.

19. A trader in embarrassed circumstances conveyed to one of his creditors his whole estates and business in trust for behoof of the grantor and his creditors, the trustee to have the management of the business, and the truster to act as his submanager, and to receive such weekly allowance as the trustee should think proper, the business to be carried on by the trustee till he should think it expedient to restore it to the truster or to sell it. The business was carried on for twenty years by the truster under supervision of the trustee, the supplies being ordered by the truster and paid for by cheques drawn by the trustee upon a bank account in his name into which the drawings were paid. The trustee gave the truster a cheque for £6 monthly for his support. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that the trustee was personally liable for goods supplied to the business, on the ground that it was carried on by him under the trust-deed, and that the truster had acted as his manager. Ford & Sons v. Stephenson, Oct. 25, 1888, p. 24.

BILL OF EXCHANGE. Necessity for presentment for payment—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, secs. 45, 46.

1. The affairs of a firm being involved, they, in November 1885, entered into an agreement with, inter alios, their principal creditors, including the Bank of Scotland, and L., a trader, who held their acceptance for £700, whereby, on the narrative that the creditors were willing to wait the result of the liquidation after mentioned, the firm conveyed their whole estates to certain persons as attorneys and managers to carry on the business, to ingather the debts due to the firm, and from time to time to make a rateable division of them among the creditors who were parties to the agreement. The attorneys and managers, by virtue of powers in the agreement, renewed from time to time L.'s bill above mentioned until April 1888, when they refused to renew it. In an action for payment against L., the drawer, by the Bank of Scotland, with whom he had discounted it, the defender pleaded that he was discharged from liability in respect of the fact, which was admitted, that the bank had not presented the bill to the acceptors for payment. Held that presentment for payment to the acceptors was not necessary, seeing that by the agreement the acceptors were not bound to pay the bill, and that the drawer had no reason to believe that it would be paid if presented, the acceptors being bound only to make payment rateably among the creditors of the funds in hand. Bank of Scotland v. Lamont & Co., June 12, 1889, p. 769.

Signature in representative capacity—Personal liability.

2. A, B, and C, signed a promissory-note in the following terms:—"We, the undersigned, in the name and on the behalf of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, Stranraer, promise to pay," &c. Held that A, B, and C, were personally liable for payment of the note. M'Meekin v. Easton, Jan. 25, 1889, p. 363.

Cancellation without authority—Liability of agent employed to collect bill.

3. The agent of the Bank of S. offered to try to obtain payment of a bill which had been protested for non-payment, and the holders accepted the offer. The acceptors offered to pay the bill and the protest charges on the condition that they should not be called upon to pay interest and expenses. The bank's agent communicated this condition to the holders, and without waiting for authority took payment of the bill and protest charges, marked the bill paid, and delivered it to the acceptors, who deleted their names thereon. Thereafter the holders intimated their refusal to agree to the condition on which payment had been made, refused to accept the sum tendered to them by the agent of the bank, and received back the bill as cancelled. They then raised an action against the acceptors for the amount of the bill, with interest, and for the expenses of the action, and obtained decree, but the acceptors became bankrupt before summary diligence could be used against them. The holders thereupon raised an action against the Bank of S., concluding for the amount of the bill, with interest, and for the expenses of their action against the acceptors. Held (dis. Lord Mure) that the evidence shewed that if the bill had not been cancelled without authority through the error of the agent of the bank, the holders might have recovered payment by summary diligence before the acceptors were sequestrated, and that the bank was liable.

BURGH. Burgh Court—Jurisdiction—Heritable Right.

1. Under a mutual disposition and settlement a husband assigned to his wife, "in liferent for her liferent alimentary use alienarly," certain house property. After the husband's death, his heir-at-law by onerous deed disposed the fee to the widow, "as liferenter of the said subjects." This disposition was placed on record. The widow thereafter married again, and after residing some time with her second husband, she separated from him, and brought an action of ejectment from the house property above mentioned against him in the Court of the royal burgh in which it was situated. The husband defended the action, on the ground that the liferent had been extinguished by the conveyance of the fee, and that the jus mariti was not excluded. The Magistrates granted warrant of ejectment, on the ground that the alimentary liferent still subsisted, and that the jus mariti of the husband was excluded. In a note of suspension at the instance of the husband, held (rev. judgment of Lord Fraser) that the question was one of heritable right, and that the Burgh Court had no jurisdiction to entertain it. Wales v. Wales, Nov. 28, 1888, p. 164.

2. In a petition to a Dean of Guild for a warrant for the erection of byres for thirty-two cows within burgh, certain neighbouring proprietors objected that the proposed buildings, if erected, would be a nuisance and injurious to health, as well as otherwise prejudicial. The Dean of Guild found that the answers raised questions which were outwith his jurisdiction, and sisted process to allow of an interdict being applied for. The respondents having failed to apply for interdict, the Dean of Guild granted the warrant craved. On appeal by the respondents, the Court sisted process to enable them, if so advised, to apply for an interdict.

CARRIER. Agreement—Construction—Common carrier—"Statuary."

C. & Co., Edinburgh, wrote to S. & Co., London,—"We have a large quantity of goods for shipment, both at Venice and Leghorn, consisting of wooden figures, old cases, marble and terra cotta busts, marble columns, wood frames, &c. Will you kindly let us know your rates for such goods from both the above ports to Glasgow by steamer, and the name of your agents at both places?" S. & Co. replied,—"We have the pleasure to quote you for alabaster goods, furniture, &c., but not for goods described as statuary, the rate of 1s. per cubic foot." Certain large terra cotta figures, of the value of £7, 10s. each, and small figures of men and animals, the property of C. & Co., were carried from Leghorn to Edinburgh on these terms through S. & Co., who contracted with steamship and railway companies for the carriage of goods, and charged through rates to the owners of the goods. The goods having been damaged in transitu, C. & Co. brought an action against S. & Co. for damages as having failed to carry the goods in safety, in implement of their contract. Held (1) that the defenders were liable as carriers for the safety of goods within their contract, and (2) (dis. Lord Lee, rev. judgment of Lord Trayner), that the terra cotta busts did not fall within the exception of "statuary." Ciceri & Co. v. Sutton & Co., June 21, 1889, p. 814.

CAUTIONER. Writ—Mandate—Onus.

1. A father, at the request of his son, signed and delivered to him to be filled up a blank paper stamped with a sixpenny stamp. The son filled in above the signature the words:—"Messrs A and B,—I hereby guarantee payment of £500 by my son J. H., and the payment of the premiums of insurance on his policies . . . assigned to your firm." The son, a few days afterwards, assigned the policies by assignment ex facie absolute to the creditor to whom the guarantee was to be delivered. The £500 was paid, but the father, on being informed of the obligation to pay the premiums, repudiated liability. In an action raised against the father by the creditor to enforce the obligation for payment of the premiums, held that as the document founded on was not tested or holograph the onus lay upon the pursuer to prove that the defender had authorised the obligation to pay the premiums to be inserted above his signature, and that the pursuer had failed to prove such authority. Wylie & Lochhead, Limited, v. Hornsby, July 3, 1889, p. 907.

2. A cautioner who has obtained from the principal debtor a special security over part of the debtor's estate for the liability he has undertaken is not bound to communicate to his co-cautioners the benefit of that security if he agreed to be cautioner only on the condition of having the security, and if the co-cautioners, when they entered into the cautionary obligation, knew of and consented to that arrangement. Hamilton & Co. v. Freeth, July 17, 1889, p. 1022.

Proof—Parole.

3. Where one of several co-cautioners, equally bound by the same deed, claimed the exclusive benefit of a security he had obtained from the principal debtor over part of his estate, on the ground that his co-cautioners had orally agreed to this, held (diss. Lord Lee) that he was entitled to prove this agreement by parole evidence. Hamilton & Co. v. Freeth, July 17, 1889, p. 1022.

CHURCH. Minister—Stipend—Cessio—Assignment to creditors.

1. The emoluments of an assistant and successor to a parish minister amounted to £100 a-year. He applied for cessio, his debts being £1100. Held that he was entitled to the benefit of cessio on his assigning £20 a-year to his creditors. Simpson v. Jack, Nov. 23, 1888, p. 131.

Principal of Missionary Institution—Contract or munus publicum.

2. Under regulations approved by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland, in reference to the employment of missionaries in India, the Foreign Mission Committee of the Church had power, inter alia, to dispense with the services of a missionary at any time by giving six months' notice. W. H., a licentiate, having accepted the office of principal of the General Assembly's institution at Calcutta, and having sustained his trials, was (as the minute of the presbytery bore) "set apart to the office of the holy ministry and inducted to the office of principal of the General Assembly's institution at Calcutta." After he had been principal for five years the committee decided to dispense with his further services, and recalled him, paying him six months' salary in lieu of notice. He then raised an action of declarator, payment, and damages against the committee, in which he maintained that they had acted illegally in recalling him, in respect (1) that, as matter of fact, he had, before accepting office, stipulated that he should not be bound by the regulations above referred to, and (2) that having been ordained and inducted to his office in due form by the presbytery, he held it ad vitam aut culpam. Held, after a proof (1) that the office in question was not a munus publicum, but that the pursuer's employment depended on an ordinary contract of service; and (2) that his engagement was terminable at six months' notice by either party in terms of the regulations. The defenders were therefore assolized. Hastie v. M'Murtrie, June 4, 1889, p. 715.

COMPANY. "Capital."

1. The prospectus of a public company set out,—“Share capital, £100,000, in 20,000 shares of £5 each. First issue £80,000, in 16,000 £5 shares. In addition to the above shares, £30,000 of six per cent debentures to be issued. . . . The consideration to be paid by the company for the whole of the before-mentioned property, together with the goodwill, has been fixed by the vendor at £90,000, of which £55,000 is payable in cash, and the balance, £35,000, in fully paid-up shares, debentures, or cash, or partly in each, at the option of the directors . . . This will leave for working capital, stock, and extension of plant, £20,000.” An applicant for 120 shares added to his letter of application the condition,—“If capital all subscribed for.” At the date of allotment the 16,000 shares were allotted, except certain shares which the company had the option of allotting to the vendor in lieu of cash, as part payment of the price of the works, &c., sold to the company, and a portion of the debentures offered to the public had not been taken up. In an action for payment of calls against the applicant, held that the whole capital had been subscribed for in the sense of his letter of application, and that he was in consequence liable in payment of the calls. Swedish Match Co., Limited, v. Seivwright, July 16, 1889, p. 989.

Capital—Issue of shares at a discount—Memorandum of Association—Illegal provision—Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867—Companies Clauses Act, 1845—Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1863.

2. Held that it is ultra vires of a company registered under the Companies Acts to issue its shares at a discount.

The memorandum and articles of association of a company registered under the Companies Acts contained provisions to the effect that the company might issue its shares “at par, or at a discount, or at a premium.” A person to whom new shares had been allotted at a discount presented a petition to the Court for rectification of the register of the company by the deletion of his name therefrom, and for an order on the company for repayment of the amount paid by him on his shares. The Court granted the prayer of the petition on the ground that the provision in the memorandum of association with regard to the issue of shares at a discount was illegal, and that such issue of shares was ultra vires of the company under the provisions of the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867. Klenck v. East India Co. for Exploration and Mining, Limited, Dec. 21, 1888, p. 271.

Capital—Power of Company to purchase its own shares—Ultra vires—Companies Act, 1862 and 1867.

3. Held that it is ultra vires of a company registered under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, to purchase its own shares, and that such a purchase is not only voidable but void.

A, a shareholder in a limited company incorporated under the Companies Acts, 1862 and 1867, sold his shares to the company in 1876, there being a provision in the articles of association binding him to offer them to the company in the first instance. A transfer was executed, and his name removed from the register. The company was successful for some years afterwards, and paid large dividends. Subsequently calls were made, and the whole nominal capital was exhausted; and ten years after the sale, and nine after A's death, the company went into liquidation. Proceedings were thereafter taken by the liquidator to have A's transfer reduced, and the names of his representatives placed upon the list of contributories, and the calls which had been made paid by them, in respect that it was ultra vires of the company to purchase its own shares. It appeared that the shareholders generally were aware that the company was in the habit of purchasing its own shares, that other purchasers than the company could easily have been found for the shares in question, and that a considerable amount of debt, still outstanding, had been incurred before as well as after the sale. Held that the transfer fell to be reduced as being ab initio void, and that in terms of the 35th section of the Companies Act, 1862, "the justice of the case" required that the names of A's representatives should be placed upon the list of contributories. General Property Investment Co. and Liquidator v. Matheson's Trustees, Dec. 21, 1888, p. 282.

Capital—Bankrupt shareholder—Discharge on composition and reinvestiture—Liability for subsequent calls on shares.

4. A shareholder in a limited company, the shares of which were only partly paid up, was sequestrated, but in 1885 was discharged, on payment of a composition, "of all debts and obligations contracted by him, or for which he was liable at the date of the sequestration," and reinvested in his estate. The company did not claim in the sequestration. In 1887 the shareholder, for the first time, requested the company to remove his name from their register, on the ground that his estates had been sequestrated, but the company refused to do so, and subsequently made a call upon him in respect of his shares. In a petition at his instance to have his name removed from the register on the ground that the amount unpaid on his shares was a debt for which he was liable at the date of his sequestration, the Court refused the prayer. Taylor v. Union Heritable Securities Co., Limited, June 1, 1889, p. 711.

Shareholder—Title to sue—Reduction.

5. A shareholder in a public company brought an action against the company concluding for reduction of an agreement between the company and certain other parties thereto, on the allegation that the agreement which had been concluded by the directors without consulting the company was to the prejudice of himself and the other independent shareholders, that it was entered into "fraudulently and collusively," and that it would have the effect of seriously and unjustly depreciating the company's shares. There were further allegations that the agreement was ultra vires of the company. The Court (rev. judgment of Lord Kinnear) held that a plea of no title to sue fell to be repelled as an objection to satisfying the production, but that the pursuer was bound to call as defenders the whole parties to the agreement, and sisted the cause to allow of that being done. Rixon v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co., March 20, 1889, p. 653.

6. On 1st November 1888 a coal company (limited) went into voluntary liquidation, and on the same day the liquidator issued a circular to the shareholders intimating that it was proposed to form a new company, and to advertise the colliery for sale at the upset price of £3000, and requesting answers before 12th November. On 3d November one of the shareholders presented a petition to have the liquidation put under the supervision of the Court, and to have an additional liquidator appointed, stating, inter alia, that coal was rising in value, and that the present was an unfavourable time to sell the colliery. On 12th November, no answers to the circular having been returned, the liquidator advertised the colliery for sale on 21st November at the upset price of £3000. The case was put out for hearing in the Summar Roll on 20th November. On 19th November a minute was lodged for the petitioner and certain concurring shareholders stating that the upset price was too low, that the notice of sale was too short, and that the liquidator was a relative of certain directors who had formed the design of starting a new company, and were anxious to acquire the colliery for an inadequate consideration. The Court refused the supervision order. Mitchell v. Rawyards Coal Co. and Liquidator, Nov. 20, 1888, p. 117.

8. Circumstances in which the Court appointed an official liquidator in the winding-up of a company, and gave him the powers conferred by the 95th, 96th, and 97th sections of the Companies Act, 1862, with special power to borrow money on the security of the assets of the company. Lochore and Capledrae Cannel Coal Co., March 2, 1889, p. 556.

CONTRACT. Constitution—Implied contract—Employment—Recompense.

1. At a meeting of creditors called by a debtor to consider the state of his affairs and an offer of composition, an accountant, who appeared for two creditors, was instructed by the whole creditors present to prepare a state of the debtor's affairs. After considerable negotiation a composition settlement was carried through by the accountant, who prepared a scheme of ranking and the promissory-notes for the instalments of the composition. The debtor had a separate agent. In an action brought by the accountant against the debtor for his services in carrying through the composition settlement, the defender pleaded that he had never employed the pursuer. Held that the defender was not liable,—Lord Rutherford Clark dissenting, on the ground that all the expenses necessarily incurred in carrying through the composition arrangement ought to be borne by the defender. Thomson, Jackson, Gourlay, & Taylor v. Lochhead, Jan. 29, 1889, p. 373.

Pactum illicitum—Contract to sell stocks to be purchased.

2. Two persons entered into a joint adventure to sell stocks in name of one of them. They did not possess the stock in which they intended to deal, but they sold it, intending to buy it in before delivery should be required by the purchaser. The market rose, and the account was continued for some time, and then closed at a loss. Held that the contract was not as between the joint adventurers a gaming transaction, and that one of the joint adventurers, who had paid the whole loss, was entitled to recover payment of half of it from the other. Mollison v. Noltie, Jan. 24, 1889, p. 350.

Executory Contract—Damages—Timeous rejection—Defence.

3. An engineer undertook in February 1883 to erect an engine on the premises of a manufacturer for a price payable one-half when the principal parts were delivered, one-fourth on the engine being started, and the remaining one-fourth three months thereafter. On 3d December 1883 the principal parts were delivered, and the first instalment of the price was paid. The engine was started on 30th September 1886, prior to which time part of the second instalment had been paid.

In an action by the engineer for payment of the remainder of this instalment the manufacturer pleaded that he was not liable in the sum sued for in respect that the engine furnished was disconform to contract, and was worth less than the engine contracted for to an extent exceeding the sum sued for. Held that the statement that the pursuer by supplying an inferior engine had not fulfilled his contract, and that the defender was in consequence entitled to an abatement of the price, was a relevant defence (seeing that the remedy of rejection was not available) to a demand for the whole price, but that as the abatement claimed was more than covered by the last instalment of the price it could not be sustained as an answer to the demand for payment of the second instalment. Dick & Stevenson v. Woodside Steel and Iron Co., Dec. 18, 1888, p. 242.

4. A steel company made the following offer to T., A., & Co., the contractors for the construction of the Forth Bridge. "We hereby offer to supply the whole of the steel required by you for the Forth Bridge, less 12,000 tons of plates, subject to the terms and conditions herein contained, at the following prices. . . . The terms and conditions in the offer were repeated, and among these the sentence, "The estimated quantity of steel we understand to be 30,000 tons, more or less." In an action brought by the steel company against T., A., & Co. for declarator that the defenders were bound to take from the pursuers the whole steel required in the construction of the bridge, and for damages in respect of the defenders having supplied themselves elsewhere with steel required for the bridge, held that the defenders were bound to take from the pursuers the whole steel required for the bridge, the mention of the 30,000 tons being merely by way of estimate of the quantity to be required. *Steel Company of Scotland v. COPYRIGHT OF DESIGNS. Infringement—Registration for shape or configuration—Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, sec. 58.

A design was registered for shape or configuration, under the 60th section of the Patents, Designs, and Trade-Marks Act, 1883, the application being for "a range door with moulding on top, moulding forming front of range, shape to be registered." The drawing shewed a moulding on the top of the door fitting into the moulding on the front of the range and flush with it. Held (in aff. judgment of First Division), that another design, which differed from the above in this, that the moulding on the door overlapped the moulding on the front of the range, was, when compared with the other, an obvious imitation of the registered design, and an infringement of it. *Hecla Foundry Co. v. 1. A Scotswoman, the daughter of a Scottish peer, married the proprietor of an entailed estate in Scotland, on which the spouses resided till the husband's death in 1883, when the estate passed to his nephew. The widow thereafter resided in London till her death in 1888. A petition by her nephew, her sole next of kin according to the law of Scotland, to be decerned her executor-dative was opposed by her brother consanguinean, who claimed to be one of the next of kin according to the law of England. He alleged that she died domiciled in England. It was proved that the deceased for a few months after her husband's death continued to reside in his house in London, which, with the furniture, he had left to her; that she then sold this house and subsequently lived in furnished houses or in lodgings in London, sometimes leaving London for a few months to reside on the Continent. She frequently expressed her intention to have no permanent home anywhere, and stated that she had no intention of returning to live in Scotland, as the climate did not suit her. Her principal adviser in business matters was the factor on the entailed estate, and her late husband's law-agents in Edinburgh continued to manage two farms in Scotland left to her by her husband (which she desired to sell), and her investments generally. It appeared that she resided in London chiefly for the sake of being near her stepmother. Held that the onus lay upon the respondent of proving that the deceased had animo et facto abandoned her domicile of origin, and that he had failed to prove her intention to abandon it. Vincent v. Earl of Buchan, March 19, 1889, p. 637.

after residing there for many years applied for confirmation in the Sheriff Court of Lanarkshire, in which county there was heritage belonging to the deceased. They produced an affidavit, in terms of the 41st section of the Sheriff Courts Act of 1876, to the effect that the deceased was a domiciled Scotsman at the date of his death. Confirmation was objected to by a person who alleged that she was one of the testator's next of kin, and that the deceased died domiciled in England, where, accordingly, the will ought to have been proved. She stated further that the testamentary deed was liable to reduction on the ground of incapacity and undue influence. Held that no ground had been set forth to justify the Court in interfering with the granting of confirmation. Hamilton v. Hardie, Dec. 7, 1888, p. 192.

DONATION. Mortis causa donation—Deposit-receipt—Effect of destination in deposit-receipt in proof of donation.

- J. M. took from a bank a deposit-receipt in these terms,—“Received from J. M., and A. M. his brother, to be drawn by them, or either, or survivor, £286, 19s. 2d.” Some months thereafter J. M. died while on a visit to A. M. After his death A. M., who became his executor, produced the receipt and claimed to have right to it as having been given to him when the deceased was ill, and in prospect of death. In an action of count and reckoning against A. M. as executor, after a proof in which, apart from the terms of the receipt, the only evidence of donation was the testimony of the alleged donee and his daughter, held that A. M. was in lawful possession of the deposit-receipt as creditor therein, and that it did not form part of J. M.'s estate. Macdonald v. Macdonald, June 11, 1889, p. 758.

ELECTION LAW. Lodger.

1. Held that a son who was allowed by his father, without contract or payment of rent, the sole use of two rooms in the father's house of the requisite yearly value, was not entitled to be enrolled as a lodger. Macdonald v. Dickson, Nov. 26, 1888, p. 143.

2. The manager of a farm, of which his mother was tenant, had the exclusive use and occupation of a bedroom in the farm-house, by virtue of his employment. His mother and sisters also resided in the farm-house, and he took his meals along with them in another room in the house. Held that the whole farm-house was inhabited by the person under whom he served, and therefore that he was not entitled to be registered as an “inhabitant-occupier of a dwelling-house” in respect of his occupancy of the bedroom. Philip v. Roxburgh, Dec. 21, 1888, p. 261.

County Franchise—Inhabitant-occupier—Imprisonment during a portion of the qualifying period—Representation of the People Acts, 1868 and 1884.

3. Held that where a man occupied a dwelling-house as the ordinary habitation of himself and his family during the qualifying period, his compulsory absence in prison during a portion of that period did not interrupt the continuity of his inhabitancy, to the effect of preventing his acquiring a qualification to vote as an “inhabitant-occupier” in the sense of the Representation of the People Acts, 1868 and 1884. Watt v. M'Guire, Dec. 21, 1888, p. 263.

ENTAIL. Sale of entailed estate “subject to ratification of Court”—Specific performance—Entail Amendment Acts, 1848, sec. 4; 1853, sec. 5; 1875, secs. 5 and 6—Entail Act, 1882, secs. 13, 19, 20, 21, 22.

- S., an heir of entail in possession, sent to K. a holograph offer to sell the entailed estate at a specified price, containing these words,—“In the event of your acceptance the sale is made subject to the ratification of the Court.” The offer was accepted. Thereafter S. presented a petition to the Court, setting forth the above missives, and sections 19-22 of the Entail Act, 1882, and praying the Court to ratify the contract constituted by the missives, and to grant an order of sale in terms thereof. The heir next entitled to succeed (who was the only other existing heir) lodged answers, in which he founded on section 22 of the Act of 1882, which gave him a right to refuse his consent to a sale by private bargain. In an action brought by K. against S., concluding for declarator that by the missives a valid contract was entered into for the sale of the estate, and that in respect thereof the defender was under a legal obligation to apply to the Court for authority and power, under the Entail Amendment Acts, to sell and dispose the estate, and for implement, the Court held that the procedure under sections 19-22 of the Act of 1882 was not applicable to the circumstances, and that the heir in possession was bound to present and prosecute to a conclusion a petition, in terms of section 4 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1848, and section 5 of the Entail Amendment Act, 1853, as amended by section 13 of the Entail Act, 1882, for a sale of the estate on the footing of compensating the next heir, and, further, ordained the pursuer to lodge in process a draft of a disposition by the defender of the entailed estate. Stewart v. Kennedy, Feb. 8, 1889, p. 421.

ERROR. Sale of entailed estate "subject to the ratification of the Court"—Issues—Reduction.

S., an heir of entail in possession, sent to K. a holograph offer to sell the entailed estate at a specified price, containing these words,—“In the event of your acceptance the sale is made subject to the ratification of the Court.” The offer was accepted in writing. In an action of declarator and implement brought by K. he contended that S. was bound to execute a disposition in favour of the purchaser at the price stated in the offer, and thereafter to obtain a ratification of the sale from the Court under the Entail Amendment Act, 1853, as amended by the 13th section of the Entail Act, 1882. In granting such ratification it was not open to the Court to consider the adequacy of the price except as affecting the interest of creditors. On the other hand S. contended that by the contract he was bound only to apply for an order of sale under the Act of 1882, whereby an entailed estate might be converted into entailed money, and the adequacy of the price would fall to be considered by the Court in the interest of the heirs of entail. The Court gave effect to the pursuer's contention. S. subsequently brought an action of reduction of the missives against K., averring, inter alia, that throughout the negotiations for a sale he had had in his mind a sale under the Entail Act, 1882, and the conversion of the estate into entailed money—conditionally upon the Court approving of the whole terms of the bargain as fair and reasonable,—which was a mode of selling an entailed estate of which he had himself had experience, and the only mode of which he was aware,—and that he had never thought of committing himself to a sale on the footing of paying compensation to the next heir under the Act of 1853, and he proposed an issue of essential error on his part as to the “import and effect of the contract.” Held that as the error alleged was not in the essentials of the contract, which were complete, but concerned only its import and effect, there was no relevant ground for an issue of essential error,—diss. Lord Shand, who held that, assuming the defender's averments to be proved, there had been no consensus in idem placitum between the parties, the pursuer by the words “subject to the ratification of the Court” having meant that the sale should be subject to the suspensive condition that the Court after inquiry should be satisfied that the transaction was advantageous to the heirs of entail generally, and that there should be no sale unless the Court considered the price adequate, while the defender intended an absolute sale with a potestative condition. Stewart v. Kennedy, June 25, 1889, p. 857.

The executors-nominate of a deceased Scotsman who had died in England after residing there for many years applied for confirmation in the Sheriff

Court of Lanarkshire, in which county there was heritage belonging to the deceased. They produced an affidavit, in terms of the 41st section of the Sheriff Courts Act of 1876, to the effect that the deceased was a domiciled Scotsman at the date of his death. Confirmation was objected to by a person who alleged that she was one of the testator's next of kin, and that the deceased died domiciled in England, where, accordingly, the will ought to have been proved. She stated further that the testamentary deed was liable to reduction on the ground of incapacity and undue influence. Held that no ground had been set forth to justify the Court in interfering with the granting of confirmation. Hamilton v. Hardie, Dec. 7, 1888, p. 192.

EXPENSES. Amendment—Condition of payment of expenses in previous actions.

1. In an action of damages for slander, the defender was assoltized from the conclusions of the summons on the ground that the record contained no relevant statement of malice, and the pursuer was found liable in expenses. In a second action founded on the same alleged slander, but containing averments of malice, held that the pursuer could not be allowed to proceed until he had paid the expenses in the former action. M'Murphy v. MacInlich, May 21, 1889, p. 678.

Incidental procedure in cause—Reservation followed by general decree for expenses.

2. Held that where the expenses of any incidental procedure in a cause are reserved, they fall to be dealt with by the Court which disposes of the general question of expenses, and that a general finding for expenses covers the expenses so reserved. Caledonian Railway Co. v. Chisholm, March 19, 1889, p. 622.

Taxation—Case under Taxes Management Act, 1880, sec. 59—Expenses of preparation and adjustment.

3. Held that the expenses of preparation and adjustment of a case stated under sec. 59 of the Taxes Management Act, 1880, incurred before the case is sent to the roll, are not proper charges against the unsuccessful party in the case. Scottish Union and National Insurance Co. v. Surveyor of Taxes, March 19, 1889, p. 624.

Taxation—Fees to counsel.

4. Held that when no fee has been sent to counsel for a particular piece of business in a cause, it may be sent and made a charge against the opposite party after the party who instructed the counsel has been found entitled to expenses. *Sim v. on his life with a Scottish company. The borrower died soon afterwards, and after his death the lender gave notice by letter to the Insurance Company that the policy had been assigned to him, and was in his possession. Thereafter the estates of the deceased were sequestrated, and a trustee appointed. Held (1) that the transaction having taken place in England the rights of the holder fell to be determined by the law of that country, and (2) upon an admission by the parties as to the law of England, that the deposit of the policy and the intimation to the Insurance Company were effectual to confer a preference upon the holder of the policy. *Scottish Provident Institution v. Arrestment—English decree for costs.

2. A on the dependence of an action against B arrested in the hands of C a sum due by him to B under a decree for costs in an English action. B's English solicitors subsequently obtained a "charging order" from the English Court, which by the law of England had the effect not only of transferring B's right to them, but of invalidating any prior attachments of the fund by his creditors. Held that the claim of the English solicitors was preferable to that of A. Stewart v. North, July 5, 1889, p. 927.

3. The wife of a domiciled Scotsman, with her husband's concurrence, sold the estate of X, in England, belonging to her, and acknowledged the conveyance before two commissioners in terms of the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV. cap. 74, for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries, declaring at the same time that she intended to give up her interest in the estate without having any provision made for her in lieu thereof. Her husband received the price and applied it to his own uses. The spouses afterwards separated by mutual consent, and the wife executed a deed of revocation of all donations and provisions made by her in her husband's favour. She then brought an action against him for declarator that the £18,000 in his hands was either (1) a surrogatum for her heritage, and not subject to the jus mariti, or (2) was a donation to him which she had validly revoked. The Court—after obtaining the opinion of the English Court to the effect that by the law of England, the law of the situs, (1) the estate of X, after the marriage, continued to belong to the wife in fee-simple, subject to a freehold estate in the husband during coverture (which entitled him to the rents); and (2) by the wife's conveyance, and her refusal of any provision, her interest in the estate was converted into personalty, and became the property of the husband—held (1) that on the wife's interest being converted into personalty the respective rights of the spouses fell to be determined by the law of Scotland, the law of their domicile; and (2) that the price of the wife's interest belonged to her as a surrogatum, exclusive of the jus mariti. *Tennent v. 2. A bondholder infert sold the security subject under his bond, but died before granting a disposition. Surrogatum—Donation inter virum et uxorem—Foreign—Sale of English heritage belonging to wife.

3. The wife of a domiciled Scotsman, with her husband's concurrence, sold the estate of X, in England, belonging to her, and acknowledged the conveyance before two commissioners in terms of the Act 3 and 4 Will. IV. cap. 74, for the Abolition of Fines and Recoveries, declaring at the same time that she intended to give up her interest in the estate without having any provision made for her in lieu thereof. Her husband received the price and applied it to his own uses. The spouses afterwards separated by mutual consent, and the wife executed a deed of revocation of all donations and provisions made by her in her husband's favour. She then brought an action against him for declarator that the £18,000 in his hands was either (1) a surrogatum for her heritage, and not subject to the jus mariti, or (2) was a donation to him which she had validly revoked. The Court—after obtaining the opinion of the English Court to the effect that by the law of England, the law of the situs, (1) the estate of X, after the marriage, continued to belong to the wife in fee-simple, subject to a freehold estate in the husband during coverture (which entitled him to the rents); and (2) by the wife's conveyance, and her refusal of any provision, her interest in the estate was converted into personalty, and became the property of the husband—held (1) that on the wife's interest being converted into personalty the respective rights of the spouses fell to be determined by the law of Scotland, the law of their domicile; and (2) that the price of the wife's interest in the estate belonged to her as a surrogatum for her heritage, exclusive of the jus mariti.

Opinion per curiam that the gift of the price of the subjects to the husband, assuming it to have been made, was a donation inter virum et uxorem, and had been competently recalled by the wife's deed of revocation. Tennent v. Tennent's Executor, June 28, 1889, p. 876.

4. A married woman sold certain heritage belonging to her in England, of which according to English law her husband had right to the rents during coverture, his right being a freehold. The husband received the price and applied it to his own uses during the marriage. In an action against his executor for recovery of the price without interest, the latter contended that the proportion of the price corresponding to the husband's freehold belonged to him. Held that although the husband might have been entitled to have the purchase money apportioned according to the value of the respective rights of husband and wife as at the date of the sale, he having enjoyed the interest of the whole price subsequently thereto, had received an equivalent for the rents of the heritage, and had no further claim. *Tennent v. Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec.-3.

6. Held that the jus mariti and right of administration of a husband are not excluded from the income of heritable estate, the fee of which has vested in his wife prior to the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881. Scott's Trustee v. Scotts, Feb. 20, 1889, p. 507.

Married Women's Property Act, 1881, sec. 6.

7. The above section applies to marriages whether contracted prior or subsequent to the date of the Act.

By an antenuptial marriage-contract entered into prior to the passing of the Married Women's Property Act, 1881, which dealt exclusively with the wife's estate, the wife conveyed to trustees her moveable estate with directions to them to hold the same "for behoof of herself, whom failing, then for behoof of her own representatives, . . . excluding always the jus mariti and right of administration of her said intended husband, and the debts and diligence of his creditors," and "in order that this trust and arrangement may receive effect" the husband renounced his jus mariti and right of administration over the estate so conveyed. The wife died leaving children of the marriage, but without having executed any further writing disposing of her estate. In a special case between the marriage-contract trustees and the husband of the deceased, held that the husband was entitled, under section 6 of the Act of 1881, to one-third of his wife's estate. Fotheringham's Trustees v. Fotheringham, June 27, 1889, p. 873.

Divorce—Wife's expenses—Separate estate.

Divorce for adultery—Reduction—Perjury—Subornation of perjury.

9. A wife against whom decree of divorce on the ground of adultery had been pronounced raised an action of reduction of the decree on the ground that the material evidence against her was perjured, and that it had been obtained by subornation of perjury on the part of a detective employed by her husband for that purpose. The Court allowed a proof before answer of the allegations of subornation of perjury, and thereafter, the pursuer having failed to establish these, held that the averments of perjury were irrelevant, and dismissed the action. Begg v. Begg, Feb. 27, 1889, p. 550.

INSURANCE. Policy—Construction—Liability "under or by virtue of Employers' Liability Act, 1880"—Action at common law.

1. An assurance company granted a policy of insurance in favour of a firm of contractors under which they contracted to "pay to the employer all sums which such employer shall become liable for under or by virtue of the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, as and for any compensation for personal injury caused to any workman in their service, while engaged in the employer's work," during the currency of the policy. A workman in the employment of the contractors raised an action against them for personal injury suffered by him while in their employment through the fault of one of the firm. The action was laid solely at common law, and damages were found due. Held that the assurance company was not bound under the policy to indemnify the contractors. Morrison & Mason v. Scottish Employers' Liability and Accident Assurance Co. Limited, Dec. 14, 1888, p. 212.

Policy—Construction—Liability defined by notice on policy.

2. A policy of insurance with an accident insurance company set forth that "if the insured shall sustain any bodily injury . . . which shall occasion permanent partial disablement (as defined on the back hereof), then the company shall be liable to pay to him the sum of £200," and in the event of permanent partial disablement not being suffered £3 a-week for a period not exceeding twenty-six weeks was allowed. On the back of the policy there was the following:—"Notice.— . . . Permanent partial disablement implies the loss of one hand, the loss of one foot, or the complete and irrecoverable loss of sight." In an action on this policy for £200 the pursuer averred that he had met with an accident whereby he had suffered permanent partial disablement, but he admitted that he had lost neither a hand, nor a foot, nor his sight. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that the action was relevant. Scott v. Scottish Accident Insurance Co., Limited, March 19, 1889, p. 630.

Horse—Insurance—Policy—Condition—Personal bar.

3. A policy of insurance granted to the owner of a horse against its death from accident or from natural disease contained, inter alia, the condition—which was declared to be a condition precedent to the owner's right to recover—that in the event of the animal insured receiving any injury, the owner should have it attended at once by a qualified veterinary surgeon, and should forward his report to the insurance company, and that on the death of an insured animal notice should be sent to the company's office accompanied, or followed as speedily as possible, by the report of a qualified veterinary surgeon. It was further provided that notice to an agent of the company should not be sufficient compliance with the condition. The horse having sustained a compound comminuted fracture of a fore leg, the owner, on the advice of a veterinary surgeon, who was not registered as such, had it killed at once, and by telegraph intimated to an agent of the company that the horse had broken its leg and had been condemned by a veterinary surgeon. This intimation was at once communicated by the agent to the manager of the company, by whom liability was at once repudiated. No report by a veterinary surgeon was forwarded to the company. In an action against the insurance company held, after a proof (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner, dub. Lord Rutherford Clark), (1) that as it had been proved that the horse was fatally injured, and that in the circumstances the proper course was to kill it at once, the case was to be taken as one of death and not of injury in the sense of the above condition; (2) that although the notice had been sent to an agent of the company, as it had de facto reached the manager timeously, it was sufficient; (3) that the instant repudiation of liability by the company had rendered it unnecessary for the pursuer thereafter to send the report required by the condition, and barred the company from objecting to the want of it. Shiells v. Scottish Assurance Corporation, Limited, July 17, 1889, p. 1014.

JURISDICTION. Arrestment ad fundandam jurisdictionem—Status.

1. The daughter of A B deceased raised an action against the trustee under his deed of settlement, C B his widow, and his sister, concluding (1) for declarator of legitimacy; (2) for payment of legitim out of his estate; (3) for payment of aliment in the event of decree not being obtained under the first two conclusions. The pursuer averred that her mother had been regularly married to A B in ignorance of the fact that he was married to C B. None of the defenders were resident within the jurisdiction of the Court, but as regarded the trustee the pursuer averred that jurisdiction had been constituted against him by arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem. The defenders pleaded that the arrestment did not found jurisdiction as the action raised a question of status, that A B had been domiciled in England, and that the law of England did not recognise legitimacy by a putative marriage. At adjustment the pursuer amended the summons by deleting the averments as to C B's marriage to A B, and stating that A B's marriage to the pursuer's mother was a lawful marriage. The Court dismissed the action, holding that it raised a question of status, and that jurisdiction could not in such an action be founded by arrestments ad fundandam jurisdictionem.

Opinions, per Lord Shand and Lord Adam, that if a summons as served is bad for want of jurisdiction it cannot be made good by subsequent alterations. Morley v. Jackson, Nov. 9, 1888, p. 78.

2. A person to found jurisdiction against A, a domiciled Englishman, arrested in the hands of B all sums due by him to A. It was proved that B had in his hands a fund belonging to an English copartnery, of which A was a partner (and no other property in which A had an interest), and that while by the law of England a partnership has no persona, and the title to the partnership assets is in the individual partners, a partner has no beneficial right other than a right to a share of the surplus assets of the partnership on realisation. Held by Lord Kinnear, Ordinary, that the arrestment was not effectual to found jurisdiction against A. Parnell v. Walter, July 3, 1889, p. 917.

3. On 26th May 1887 A, to found jurisdiction against B, a domiciled Englishman, arrested in the hands of C a sum due by him to B under a decree for costs in an English action, and on the following day A served a summons upon B. On 13th June 1887 B's English solicitors obtained from the English Court a charging order, which by the law of England had the effect not only of transferring B's claim for costs to them, but of invalidating any prior attachment by a creditor of B. B pleaded no jurisdiction, and the Lord Ordinary (Kinnear) sustained the plea, on the ground that B's claim for costs against C being defeasible the arrestment was ab initio ineffectual to attach the debt. On a reclaiming note the Court reversed the Lord Ordinary's judgment, holding that as there was a debt due by C to B at the date of the arrestment jurisdiction had been duly constituted when the summons was served, and that the subsequent transfer of B's right did not affect the jurisdiction already constituted. Stewart v. North, July 5, 1889, p. 927.

4. Held by Lord Kinneir, Ordinary, that neither the direct dispatch by post of an English newspaper from the publishing office in England to persons in Scotland, nor the sale of the newspaper in Scotland, is sufficient to give the Scots Courts jurisdiction to entertain an action of damages for slander alleged to have been published in the newspaper. *Parnell v. Forum conveniens.

5. The child of a deceased person raised an action concluding (1) for declarator of legitimacy; (2) for payment of legitim out of his estate; (3) for payment of aliment in the event of decree not being obtained under the first two conclusions. The action was directed against the trustee of the deceased under his deed of settlement, his widow, and his sister, the two latter of whom were interested in respect of their pecuniary rights and interests in the estate of the deceased. All the defenders were in England, but the pursuer alleged that she had used arrestments to found jurisdiction against the trustee. Opinions, per Lord Shand and Lord Adam, that in the absence of the widow and sister, who were the real parties interested in the action as defenders, the Court of Session was non forum conveniens to try the question with the trustee, who was only interested as a holder of funds. Morley v. Jackson, Nov. 9, 1888, p. 78.

JUS QUÆSITUM TERTIO. Insurance—Guarantee.

An association of underwriters before admitting a new member were in the practice of inquiring into his financial position, and in certain cases of requiring a guarantee for underwriting obligations to be contracted by him. Held by Lord Kyllachy that a guarantee so granted conferred a jus quæsitum on any person subsequently assured by such underwriter. Ross, Murison, & Thomson v. Wingate, Birrell & Co.'s Trustee, July 19, 1889, p. 1132.

JUSTICIARY CASES. Jurisdiction—Circuit Court—Winter Sitting in Glasgow—Appeal—Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 29, sec. 1—The Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, sec. 46.

1. Held that the Winter Sitting of the High Court of Justiciary at Glasgow is, notwithstanding the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, held under the Act 9 Geo. IV. c. 29, and therefore that it is not competent to hear or dispose of any appeals thereat. M'Kenzie v. M'Phee, Dec. 29, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 43.

Jurisdiction—High Court—Circuit Court—Suspension—Competency—Fundamental nullity—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, secs. 131 and 132.

2. Objection to the competency of a suspension of a conviction in the Glasgow Police Court on the ground that the jurisdiction of the High Court was excluded by sections 131 and 132 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, repelled, the Court (dis. Lord Adam) holding that the proceedings on which the conviction followed, were contrary to the recognised forms of criminal procedure, and were funditus null. M'Kenzie v. M'Phee, Jan. 28, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 53.

Jurisdiction—High Court—Circuit Court—Suspension—Industrial Schools Act, 1866—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, secs. 131 and 132.

3. A girl, ten years of age, was taken with her mother to a Police Court and charged with theft under the Glasgow Police Act, 1866. The magistrate sent the child to an industrial school for five years, "in pursuance of the Industrial Schools Act, 1866." He pronounced this order without intimation to and in the absence of the child's father, and in the face of her mother's remonstrances. The Court repelled an objection to the competency of a bill of suspension founded on sections 131 and 132 of the Glasgow Police Act, 1866, holding that though the proceedings originated under that Act, the order was pronounced under the Industrial Schools Act, 1866, which contained no exclusion of review by the High Court, and quashed the order as, in the circumstances, improper. M'Kenzies v. M'Phee, Jan. 28, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 53.

Jurisdiction—Sheriff—Citation out of Jurisdiction—Endorsement of warrant of Judge of Police Court—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, secs. 333 and 5.

4. Held that under sections 333 and 5 of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, the warrant of the Judge of Police in Edinburgh is sufficient for citing or apprehending any person resident in another county who is charged with an offence which may be tried by him, if such warrant be endorsed by the Sheriff of the county of Edinburgh or Midlothian, or any one of his substitutes. Cairns v. Linton, March 4, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 81.

Crimes—Breach of the Peace—Disturbance in accused's own house.

5. Under a complaint for a breach of the peace, it was proved that the accused, in his house, which was situated in a street in a burgh, had, early on Sunday morning, for a considerable period, used loud language and oaths and imprecations, which had been heard by two constables at a distance of thirty yards from his house. The Court sustained a conviction, holding that the acts proved amounted to a breach of the peace, as being acts calculated to cause reasonable apprehension to the lieges. Ferguson v. Carnochan, July 8, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 93.

6. Two persons were indicted on the charge that "you having" while carrying on business in partnership "formed a fraudulent scheme for obtaining on credit the goods of others on false pretences, and appropriating them to your own use, did in pursuance thereof" make certain specified false representations "concerning your means and financial position" to other traders, and did thereby deceive and impose upon them, "and did thus induce" them "to supply you on credit with . . . goods to the value specified" in the indictment, "towards the settlement of which you did not pay more" than certain sums specified, "and you did thus cheat and defraud" these traders of certain specified amounts, being the difference between the sum paid by the accused and the total value of the goods. Objections were taken to the relevancy of the charge, viz., first, that the alleged false representations were not stated to be the cause of obtaining the goods, and second, that the indictment did not set forth a crime, because it appeared from its own terms that part of the goods had been paid for, and that to the credit thence arising the delivery of the other goods must be ascribed. The Court repelled both objections. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Macleods, Sept. 12, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 1.

7. A cattle-dealer was charged with an offence against the above Acts and Order, in respect that he "did move or cause, direct, and permit to be moved" certain cattle without their being accompanied by a declaration in terms of the regulations of the Lanarkshire Local Authority, into whose district they were to be moved, and was convicted. A case on appeal obtained by him stated that the appellant sold the cattle in Ayrshire, that the purchaser's drover who removed them into Lanarkshire had not a declaration properly filled up and countersigned by a police-officer, in terms of the regulations of the Local Authority of Lanarkshire, and that the Justices were "of opinion that the appellant was the only person who could have made the declaration, and in permitting the removal of the cattle without such declaration, in the knowledge that they were to be moved into the county of Lanark, was guilty of the offence charged." Held that there were no grounds stated in the case to justify the conviction, and that it must be set aside. Dunlop v. Weir, Nov. 22, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 14.

Statutory offences—Day Trespass Act, 1832—Son of tenant with permission to shoot rabbits on farm.

8. Held that a person who had verbal permission from his father, the tenant of a farm, to shoot rabbits, and who shot while upon the farm two grouse, was guilty of a trespass under the Day Trespass Act. Maxwell v. Maraland, Jan. 28, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 48.

Statutory offences—Day Trespass Act, 1832—Alternative charge—General conviction.

9. Held that the enumeration of "deer, roe, woodcocks, snipes, quails, land-rails, wild ducks, or conies," contained in the first section of the Day Trespass Act, was not inserted for the purpose of stating a number of alternative ways in which a contravention of the statute could be committed, but as shewing to what animals the protection of the Act extended, and that therefore a general conviction following upon such a charge was good, even though the person convicted had a right to kill "conies." Maxwell v. Maraland, Jan. 28, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 48.

Statutory offences—Debtors Act, 1880, sec. 13, subsection B (3)—Obtaining property by any fraud within four months of sequestration.

10. Two persons who were sequestered on 17th March 1888 were charged with an offence against the Debtors Act, 1880, sec. 13, subsection B (3), in respect that within four months prior to sequestration they obtained by means of fraudulent representations, made more than four months prior thereto, property on credit, and which had not been paid for, viz., "from R. Walker & Sons to the extent of £297, 6s. 7d.," and from four other traders specified "to the extent of" certain specified sums. Held that the charge was irrelevant, because it did not specify the particular goods supplied within the four months.

Opinion, per Lord McLaren, that in order to a relevant charge under the subsection the prosecutor must aver that the false representation by means of which the goods were obtained was itself made within the four months prior to the sequestration. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Macleoda, Sept. 12, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 1.

11. A person who had delivered certain boxes of salmon to a railway company in Aberdeen, addressed to a firm in Paris, for transmission by inland railway to Newhaven in England and by shipment thence to France, was convicted of a contravention of the 22d section of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868. The Court quashed the conviction, holding that an inland railway station was not a "wharf, quay, or other place for exportation" within the meaning of the section. Adams v. Cadenhead, Jan. 28, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 51.

Statutory offences—Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868 (31 and 32 Vict. c. 123), sec. 21—Possession of salmon in close time.

12. Held that "annual close time" in the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868, means the period during which net-fishing for salmon is prohibited, and not the period during which fishing by rod and line is also prohibited.

Held, therefore, that a complaint which charged a contravention of sec. 21 of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1868, in respect that the accused had, on 29th November 1888, "in their possession salmon . . . taken within the limits of the said Act between the commencement of the latest and the termination of the earliest annual close time for any district in Scotland," was relevant, although on the day libelled it was lawful to fish for salmon in the Tweed district by rod and line. Chalmers v. Bain, March 4, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 77.

Statutory offences—Truck Act, 1831, sec. 2, sec. 23—Miner—Contract that employer may retain wages for "rent" after employment has ceased.

13. In a complaint against the manager of a coal company, on the ground that an agreement with a workman in terms of the regulations of the company was a contravention of the Truck Act, 1831, held that as the written agreement contained in the pay-ticket signed by a workman was limited to the period of his employment, and did not authorise deduction of one shilling per day for his subsequent occupation of his house in terms of article 4 of the regulations, the stipulation in that article that the employer should be entitled to make that deduction was a contravention of the Act, and did not fall under sec. 23, in respect (1) that it was not covered by the written agreement; and (2) that the payment for occupation without a title was not rent in the sense of the Act; and (3) that these payments were not due by a person employed. McFarlane v. Birrell, Dec. 7, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 28.

14. Held that, under sections 8 and 18 of the Vaccination Act, 1863, the name of a person who has failed to transmit a certificate of vaccination of his child must be placed on the registrar's list during each successive period of six months for which such failure may subsist, and that the offence is committed on each occasion on which the order to have the child vaccinated, following on such list being laid before the parochial board, is disobeyed.

A person charged with a contravention of section 18 of the Vaccination Act, 1863, by refusing to allow his child to be vaccinated by the vaccinator appointed by the parochial board after an order made by the board under that section, objected to the competency of the complaint on the ground that he had a year previously been convicted under the same section of refusing to allow the same child to be vaccinated. Held that the objection to the competency was bad. Skene v. Falconer, March 4, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 72.

Bail—Rape—Bail (Scotland) Act, 1888.

15. Per Lord Justice-Clerk, in a charge of rape bail should only be allowed in very exceptional cases, and not at all where the Lord Advocate objects and states on his responsibility that his investigation of the case does not disclose any facts tending to shew that it should be dealt with as exceptional. Wilson v. McGuire, June 20, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 89.

Indictment—Relevancy—Use of qualifying words—Criminal Law Procedure Act, 1887, sec. 8.

16. Held that a libel was a relevant charge of culpable homicide, although not containing words such as "culpably and recklessly" qualifying the acts charged. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Parker and Barrie, Nov. 5, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 5.

17. An indictment against J. S. bore,—“You did pretend to J. H. . . . that you were possessed of a sum of money amounting to £1900 . . . and that you were about to receive payment of the said money, and did thus induce him to give you credit to the amount of £46, 9s. 9d., which you failed to pay and had no intention of paying.” Objection to the relevancy in respect that the facts set forth did not constitute a crime repelled (diss. Lord Young), on the ground that under the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, the words “falsely and fraudulently” were to be read into the indictment as qualifying the word “pretend,” and that when this was done the indictment was relevant. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Swan, Dec. 10, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 34.

18. The master and mate of a vessel were charged on an indictment which set forth that, certain insurances having been effected on the vessel, and these insurances being still in force, they did bore one or more holes in the vessel, and did attempt to force out her bow ports in order that she might sink, and did spread oil over her in order that she might be set on fire, and “did thus attempt to sink and destroy the said barque with intent to defraud the insurers liable under said insurances.” Objection was taken to the relevancy on the ground that the indictment failed to set forth knowledge on the part of the accused that the vessel had been insured, without which fraudulent intent could not be inferred. Held (per Lord Justice-Clerk) that the allegation of an attempt to destroy the vessel “with intent to defraud” the insurers implied knowledge of the insurances, and that the qualifying words “you well knowing that the ship had been so insured” were to be implied by virtue of section 8 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887, and that the indictment was relevant.

Opinion that in the event of the prosecutor failing to prove fraudulent intent, it would be competent for the jury to convict the accused of an attempt to sink the ship maliciously, the word “maliciously” being in that event read in to qualify the acts charged, and a conviction of a part of what was charged in an indictment, if in itself an indictable crime, being competent by section 60 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1887. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Bourdais, Jan. 28, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 68.

Indictment—Specification—Relevancy.

19. In an indictment the charge against the accused was that he did make certain pretences to an innkeeper, “and did thus induce him to give you credit to the amount of £46, 9s. 9d., which you failed to pay and had no intention of paying.” Held that the indictment was irrelevant, in respect of failure to specify the money or goods constituting the sum of which the innkeeper was to be proved to have been defrauded. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Swan, Dec. 10, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 34.

Indictment—Ship—Collision—Competency of charging pilots of respective ships in one indictment—Culpable and reckless steering—Culpable homicide.

20. Two pilots, J. P. and J. B., were charged in one indictment, setting forth that on an occasion and at a place libelled, “you, J. P., when pilot in charge of the ship ‘Balmoral Castle,’ there being risk of a collision between the said vessel and the steamship ‘Princess of Wales,’ did fail to slacken speed by stopping and reversing, contrary to article 18 of the Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, issued in pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Acts Amendment Act, 1862, and you, J. B., when pilot in charge of the said steamship ‘Princess of Wales,’ there being risk of collision as aforesaid, did fail to slacken speed by stopping and reversing, and did put to starboard the helm of the said steamship ‘Princess of Wales,’ contrary to articles 18 and 15 of said Regulations, and you did both fail to navigate your respective vessels with proper and seamanlike care, and did cause said vessels to come into collision, and did thus kill certain persons.” Held (1) that it was competent to try both the accused under one indictment for their alleged separate and unconnected acts of negligence; and (2) on a motion to separate the trials, that the trials ought not to be separated.

Held further, that the indictment was relevant, repelling objections to the relevancy (1) that the Regulations founded on were neither referred to in the manner prescribed by sec. 9 of the Criminal Procedure (Scotland) Act, 1887, rendering quotation of statutes unnecessary, nor fully and correctly quoted; (2) that the charge of “failing to navigate your respective vessels with proper and reasonable care” was defective in specification. Her Majesty's Advocate v. Parker and Barrie, Nov. 5, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 5.

Sentence—Prosecution in forms prescribed by local Police Act—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1881—Dundee Police and Improvement Consolidation Act, 1882—Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862.

21. On a complaint brought in Dundee, under the form prescribed by the

Dundee Police and Improvement Consolidation Act, 1882, the accused was charged and convicted of a second offence of shebeening, and sentenced by the magistrate to pay a fine of £15 or to be imprisoned for three months, in terms of sec. 17 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862. The Court suspended the sentence simpliciter, holding that secs. 3 and 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1881 applied to the complaint, and that, therefore, the period of imprisonment adjudged was illegal, in respect that it should not have exceeded two months. Gray v. Dewar, July 18, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 97.

Sentence—Sentence proceeding upon an illegal previous conviction.

22. A boy, nine years of age, was charged with theft aggravated by two previous convictions. He pleaded guilty, and was sentenced. One of the previous convictions had been obtained against him when he was five years of age. The Court quashed the sentence, holding that the previous conviction in question was null, and ought not to have been under the consideration of the Judge in giving sentence. Grant v. Allan, June 3, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 87.

Review—Appeal—Amendment of case.

23. Where a case obtained by a person convicted of a statutory offence disclosed no ground for a conviction, and its amendment would have involved the statement of a totally new case after a considerable interval from the date of the proof, the Court refused to remit the case to the inferior Court for amendment. Dunlop v. Weir, Nov. 22, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 14.

LEASE. Constitution—Rei interventus.

1. Question, whether a tenant's abstaining from giving the statutory notice of his intention to terminate a lease in consequence of an informal agreement with his landlord for a new lease at a reduced rent could be held to be sufficient rei interventus to validate the agreement. Sutherland's Trustee v. Miller's Trustee, Oct. 19, 1888, p. 10.

Tacit Relocation.

2. An agricultural tenant whose lease was to expire at Whitsunday 1885 made a verbal arrangement with his landlord as to a new lease at a reduced rent. The landlord, on 1st December 1884, delivered to him an open letter to the factor stating the terms of the new lease, and desiring the factor to prepare a formal lease. Owing to delay on the part of the factor, and to the insolvency of the landlord, who was obliged to execute a trust-deed for behoof of creditors, the formal lease was never executed. The tenant remained in possession of the holding till 1887. In an action by the landlord's trustee for the rent under the old lease on the ground that it had been renewed by tacit relocation, held that the tenant's possession was to be referred not to tacit relocation, but to the new arrangement. Sutherland's Trustee v. Miller's Trustee, Oct. 19, 1888, p. 10.

3. In an action for payment of rent the defender alleged that the landlord had in the missives of lease bound himself to give possession of certain farm buildings in tenantable condition, and that he had failed to do so, and that the tenant was entitled to an abatement of rent. Held that the defence was relevant. Munro v. McGeoghs, Nov. 15, 1888, p. 93.
4. A farm was let from year to year under a lease, which was terminable on either side by written notice six months before the term of Whitsunday, and in which the landlord undertook to put the existing buildings into complete repair. The landlord spent a considerable sum on repairs on the entry of the tenants, who continued in occupation for five years, when the lease terminated. In the third year they asked for certain new buildings, but the request was refused. They paid the rent for four and a-half years without reservation of any claim against the landlord, and left the farm at the end of five years. In an action by the landlord to recover the last half year's rent, the tenants maintained that they were entitled to an abatement of that rent or compensation for loss sustained by them during the whole of the currency of the lease from the pursuer's failure to put the buildings into complete repair. The Court repelled the defences and granted decree. Stewart v. Campbell, Jan. 19, 1889, p. 346.

5. A building lease granted in 1876 for ninety-nine years contained a provision that the tenant "shall not sell or retail spirits upon the premises without the express consent of the proprietor or his factor for the time being," the proprietor or his factor "being the sole judge of all such matters." In 1876 the landlord consented to an application by the tenant for a grocer's licence which was granted for that year, and renewed without objection for seven years afterwards. The alterations made by the tenant to adapt his premises for the sale of spirits were very slight. In 1884 the landlord objected to the renewal of the licence, and subsequently he brought an interdict against the continued sale of spirits by the tenant. In answer, the defender pleaded (1) that the pursuer had once for all discharged the prohibition in the lease; and (2) that he was barred by acquiescence for seven years from insisting in the action. Held, after a proof, (1) that the landlord had neither expressly nor by acquiescence discharged the conditions in the lease, and (2) that he was entitled to recall his consent if the defender's actings justified his doing so, and that the defender's conduct of his business had been shewn to be such as to entitle the pursuer to interdict. Lord Macdonald v. Campbell, Feb. 27, 1889, p. 540.

Right to cut peats—Crofters Holdings Act, 1886.

6. The yearly tenant of a croft, with the right to cut peats in the moss of A, in 1867 obtained permission from the landlord to cut peats from the moss of B, said permission to continue during the pleasure of the landlord. The crofter thereafter got his peats from B and not from A. In 1887 the landlord withdrew the permission to cut peats in B. The crofter having continued to take peats from B, the landlord applied for interdict against him. The defender maintained that the right to cut peats from B formed part of his holding in the sense of the Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, and that the application for interdict was therefore incompetent. Held that the landlord was entitled to withdraw the permission to cut peats conditionally given, and that interdict fell to be granted. Parr v. Maclean, June 19, 1889, p. 810.

Summary ejection—Failure to stock—Process—Irregularity in proceedings—Sheriff—Jurisdiction.

7. In a Sheriff Court petition by the landlord of a farm for warrant to sequester and sell his tenant's effects for rent past due, and for an order on the tenant to replenish the farm if necessary, decree of sale was pronounced of consent, and the sale having exhausted the subjects, the landlord moved for an order on the tenant to re-stock, and on his failure to do so within fourteen days, for decree of summary ejection, and warrant to re-let. The tenant by minute stated that he was proceeding to stock. The Sheriff in respect of this minute remitted to a man of skill to see the stocking carried out, and to report within one month. The man of skill reported at the end of the month that the farm had not been re-stocked. The Sheriff thereupon granted warrant for summary ejection. In an action for reduction of this warrant by the tenant, held (diss. Lord Young) that as the Sheriff had not fixed a time within which the re-stocking must be carried out, the tenant was not in default, and that decree of reduction of the warrant to eject fell in consequence to be pronounced.

Question, whether the Sheriff has jurisdiction to grant warrant for the summary ejection of the tenant of an agricultural subject on account of failure to stock. Opinion per Lord Young that he has. Macdonald v. Mackessack, Nov. 30, 1888, p. 169.

MAILS AND DUTIES. Right in Security—Heritable creditor.

When a heritable creditor has obtained a decree of mails and duties against the tenants on an estate in an action in which the proprietor has been called for his interest, and has not appeared, he is thereafter in possession of the estate, and has a good title to use sequestration for rent against any one subsequently possessing as tenant, although he may not have been called in the action of mails and duties. Robertson's Trustees v. Gardner, May 31, 1889, p. 705.

MANDATE. See Cautioner, 1—Proof, 2.MARRIAGE-CONTRACT. Informality—Rei interventus—Writ—Notarial execution—Agent and Client.

1. A widow brought an action of reduction of her antenuptial marriage-contract against her husband's trustees on the ground that the notary-public who executed the deed on her behalf, she being unable to write, was at the time acting as her husband's law-agent in the matter. Held that, assuming that the execution of the deed was invalid, the marriage, which took place on the faith of the contract, validated the deed rei interventu. Lang v. Lang's Trustees, March 15, 1889, p. 590.

Construction—Statute passed after date of contract.

2. Observed, where a postnuptial marriage-contract was dated in 1840, that the construction of the words "nearest of kin" occurring in the deed was not affected by the passing of the Moveable Succession Act, 1855. Gregory's Trustees v. Alison, April 8, 1889, H. L., p. 10.

See Succession, 16, 17.

MASTER AND SERVANT. Constitution of Contract—Proof—Presumption.

A father claimed wages from his son, who was a country grocer, for his services as vanman for a period of eight years. The trustee on the son's sequestrated estate rejected the claim on the ground that the father, as appeared from the bankrupt's deposition, had been maintained and clothed by the son, and that there was no agreement to give wages. In an appeal against that deliverance the Court held that there was a presumption in favour of wages being due, and allowed a proof. Thomson v. Thomson's Trustee, Jan. 12, 1889, p. 333.

Where the pupil proprietor of a landed estate, who had no moveable funds, was under a personal obligation to pay certain provisions to his younger brothers and sisters, and was paying 5 per cent of interest on these provisions, power was granted to his tutors-nominate to grant bonds and dispositions in security over the pupil's estate in order to pay off the provisions, on the ground that money could be borrowed on such security at 3½ per cent, and that thus a large saving of interest would be effected. Grant, Jan. 26, 1889, p. 365.

PARENT AND CHILD. Custody—Conjugal Rights Act, 1861, sec. 9—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, sec. 5.

1. Held that where in an action of separation a father has been deprived of the custody of his child, it is competent for him to present a petition under section 2 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886.

Observed that in a petition under section 5 the Court could give effect to considerations which could not be regarded in determining an action of separation and aliment. Beedie v. Beedie, March 20, 1889, p. 648.

Custody—Bastard—Wish of deceased parent—Nobile Officium.

2. The mother of a bastard gave up the custody of the child, aged one year, to Mrs S., a member of the Scottish Episcopal Church, who maintained the child until the death of the mother, about 4½ years thereafter. A few weeks before her death, the mother, who had meanwhile become a Roman Catholic, and was living in a Roman Catholic Convent, executed a settlement, in which she nominated J. B., a Roman Catholic, to be tutor and guardian to her child, and said, "being a Roman Catholic myself, it is my desire that my said son be brought up in that faith." On the day on which she executed the settlement she raised an action against Mrs S. for delivery of the child, but died during the dependence of the action, which was accordingly dismissed. In a petition at the instance of J. B. against Mrs S. for delivery of the child, held that as it was not disputed that the child would be equally well cared for and educated, whether it was in the custody of the petitioner or of Mrs S., the expressed wishes of the mother should be given effect to. The Court therefore granted the prayer of the petition. Brand v. Shaws, Dec. 22, 1888, p. 315.

3. Prior to 1884 S. established and managed a home for destitute children in Edinburgh. In December 1882 a man applied to have his three children (all under five years of age) admitted to the home, and agreed to pay for their board at the rate of 2s. 6d. per week. The children were admitted, and he made payments to account of board down to June 1883, but not thereafter. In May 1884 S. appointed a board of directors. In May 1886 S. removed the children, without their father's consent, to a home she had established in Nova Scotia. The father having applied to the directors to have his children restored, S., at the request of the directors brought the children to Edinburgh in November 1886, and this fact was intimated to the father, but neither he nor the directors took any proceedings to obtain the custody of the children. S., who had concealed the children's address from the directors and from their father, again removed the children to Nova Scotia. In June 1888 the father presented a petition against S. and the directors of the home, praying to have the respondents ordained to restore the children to him. The directors maintained that they were not responsible for the delivery of the children, in respect (1) that they were not parties to their removal, and had never had them in their custody since; and (2) that they had intimated to the father the return of the children to this country in order that he might recover them if he wished to do so. The Court, holding that the directors of the home had, by accepting office in 1884, become responsible for the custody of the children, pronounced an order ordaining them and S. to deliver the children to their father. Delaney v. Directors of Edinburgh and Leith Children's Aid and Refuge, June 7, 1889, p. 753.

Guardianship—Bastard—Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886.

4. A mother cannot appoint a tutor to her bastard child.

Held that the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886, does not apply to bastards, and that therefore a mother cannot nominate a guardian to her bastard child under the provisions of that Act. Brand v. Shaws, Dec. 22, 1888, p. 315.

with the mother, the Court appointed a person, nominated by the mother, to act jointly with her as tutor, in terms of section 2 of the Guardianship of Infants Act, 1886. Martin v. Stewart, Dec. 1, 1888, p. 185.

See Reparation, 1.

PARTNERSHIP. Goodwill—Exclusive use of firm name.

1. Smith, one of the partners of Smith & M'Bride, bought the business and goodwill, and carried the business on for three years in his own name. At the end of that time his former partner M'Bride and a person also named Smith, who had entered into partnership with him, began to trade in the same business in the same town, under the name Smith & M'Bride. Held that Smith was entitled to interdict against their trading under that name. Smith v. M'Bride & Smith, Oct. 27, 1888, p. 36.

Liability of assumed partner for prior debts—Bankruptcy.

2. A creditor lent money to a firm on the security of certain heritable subjects belonging to it—the obligation for repayment being granted by the firm and by its two partners. The money was expended upon the erection of buildings upon the ground, which were used partly as business premises, and partly as a house for the manager. Three years later the two partners proposed to take a new partner, and a new contract of copartnership was executed for carrying on the business in the same firm name as before by the three partners. The contract contained a stipulation that the new firm should have no concern with the debts due to or by the old firm. The right to the security subjects was not transferred to the new firm, which paid a rent to the old firm for the use of the premises occupied by them, and the creditor in the bond knew nothing of the change of partnership. The actings of the new firm were in keeping with the provisions of the contract of copartnership—sets of books being kept for each of the old and new firms, and payments of debts due by the old firm being entered to its debit. On the bankruptcy of the new firm, held that the heritable creditor was not entitled to rank in the sequestration. Stephen's Trustee v. Macdougall & Co.'s Trustee, June 14, 1889, p. 779.

Foreign—Share in partnership—Inventory-duty.

3. In an action at the instance of the Inland Revenue against the executors of a partner of a trading company connected with India concluding for additional inventory-duty in respect of the value of the share of the deceased in the company, held that whether the partnership was to be regarded as an Indian or a British partnership, the additional duty was exigible on the ground that the executors being precluded by the contract from holding shares in the partnership, the right vested in them was a right to a sum of money recoverable in this country, dis. Lord Shand, who held that the right vested in the executors at the deceased's death was a share in an Indian company, and that that share was not liable for inventory-duty in the United Kingdom. Lord Advocate v. Laidlay's Trustees, July 12, 1889, p. 959.

Where a person makes a payment in the knowledge that the sum paid is not due, he is presumed to have waived all objection, and to have admitted the debt. In order, however, to bar his right to repetition of the payment it must be established that the knowledge that the sum was not due either was, or should have been, present to his mind at the time of payment. *Dalmellington Iron Co., Limited, v. £122 (of interest), after obtaining payment of his bond by realising the heritage, assigned his preference over the moveables to the holder of a second bond. In a question between the trustee on the debtor's sequestrated estate and the holder of the second bond, held that the holder of the first bond was bound as far as possible to take payment from the moveables or to assign his preference over them to the second bondholder, and that having taken payment entirely from the heritage the second bondholder had right to his preference over the moveables. *Nicol's Trustee v. 2. A Sheriff having refused to a poinding creditor a warrant to sell under sec. 26 of the Personal Diligence Act, 1838, on the ground that the debtor had applied for the benefit of cessio, the creditor appealed under sec. 65 of the Court of Session Act, 1868. Held that the creditor was entitled to a warrant of sale. Simpson v. Jack, Nov. 23, 1888, p. 131.

POLICE. Street—Burgh Footway—Maintenance—Police and Improvement Act, 1862, sec. 149.

1. Held that, under the above enactment, in the cases where the commissioners are not entitled to require the owner to construct a footway, but may construct one themselves and recover one-third of the expense from the owner, the obligation of maintenance, if such footway be constructed by them, is divisible between them and the owner in the same proportion,—dis. Lord Rutherford Clark, who held that the obligation of maintenance rested solely on the owner. *Commissioners of Police of Dalkeith v. Affixing bills to building without authority—Glasgow Police Act, 1866, secs. 149, 131, 132—Exclusion of review except by Circuit Court.

2. In a suspension of the conviction of the owner of a house under the above Act, the Court held that section 149 of the Act did not apply to the case of the occupier or owner of the building placing bills upon it, but only to third parties, and therefore that the charge and whole proceedings thereon were outwith the statute and illegal, and quashed the conviction, repelling objection to the competency of the suspension founded on sections 131 and 132 of the statute, which exclude review except by the next Circuit Court, on the ground that the complaint and conviction were ex facie illegal. Kidger v. McPhee, Nov. 22, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 24.

1. A tailor, who lived with his wife and family in a house which he rented in the parish of South Leith, accepted a situation in Cupar-Fife, when there were still six weeks to run of the five years necessary to give him a residential settlement in South Leith. At first he took lodgings in Cupar, generally returning to visit his wife in Leith from Saturday to Monday. At the end of the six weeks, 26th May 1884, he removed his wife and family to Cupar to a house he had taken for them there immediately after he went to reside at Cupar, but of which he could not get possession till the May term. Held that he had not acquired a residential settlement in South Leith. Greig v. Simpson, Oct. 25, 1888, p. 18.

A pursuer in a Sheriff Court action for damages for personal injury appealed to the Court of Session against a judgment of a Sheriff, affirming the judgment of his Substitute, and assoilzieing the defenders. The pursuer applied for the benefit of the poor's-roll, and the reporters on the probabilis causa were equally divided in opinion. The Court refused the application. Watson v. Callander Coal Co., Nov. 17, 1888, p. 111.

PRESCRIPTION (TRIENNIAL). Tradesman's account.

1. A joiner after the death of a customer, raised in December 1887 an action against his representative for payment of an account, stated continuously, and containing entries from June 1875 to May 1886. A portion of the account, from June 1876 to May 1877, amounting to upwards of £350, consisted of charges incurred for work and materials supplied in a building adventure in which the customer had been engaged at that time. Quoad ultra, it was a jobbing account, and for the last nine years of its currency amounted only to £3, 9s. 7d. The defender maintained that the portion which related to the building adventure was a separate account, and pleaded prescription in regard to it. The Court repelled the plea, holding that the whole account was to be considered as one. Ross v. Cowie's Executrix, Dec. 14, 1888, p. 224.

Entries made to avoid plea of prescription.

2. Where in an action on a tradesman's account the defender stated that the last two entries therein were fictitious, and had been stated in order to avoid the operation of prescription, the Court allowed proof before answer as to these items. Ross v. Cowie's Executrix, Dec. 14, 1888, p. 224.

PROCESS. Amendment of Summons—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 29.

1. An action was raised to have a steamship forthwith delivered to the pursuers, "or alternatively, in the event of the defender . . . failing so to deliver to the pursuers the said steamship," to have the whole defenders found liable in damages. After evidence had been led, which dealt with damage sustained before the raising of the action as well as after, and judgment had been pronounced in the Outer-House, the pursuers and reclaimers moved to be allowed to substitute for the words quoted above, the words "and in any event." Held (1) (diss. Lord Lee) that the summons as laid did not conclude for damage from non-delivery prior to the date of the action, and (2) that as the effect of the amendment would be to include such damage, the amendment was incompetent. Laming & Co. v. Seater, June 21, 1889, p. 828.

Summons—Amendment—Sheriff Court Act, 1876.

2. Held that a summons raised in the Sheriff Court by a widow in her individual capacity could not on her being subsequently decerned executrix-dative to her husband, be amended so as to admit of her suing also as executrix, the power of amendment given in sec. 24 of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876, not being applicable to such a case. Turnbull v. Veitch, July 18, 1889, p. 1079.

against the pursuer, that a charge for payment had expired without payment, and that the pursuer was therefore notour bankrupt within the meaning of the Debtors Act, 1880. He pleaded that the pursuer should, ante omnia, be ordained to find caution for expenses. The Court refused to ordain the pursuer to find caution. Macrae v. Sutherland, Feb. 9, 1889, p. 476.

6. As a general rule the Court will not ordain an insolvent defender to find caution for expenses. Lawrie v. Pearson, Nov. 3, 1888, p. 62.

Reclaiming note—Interlocutor assigning day for adjustment of issues.

7. In an action for damages for wrongous dismissal, the Lord Ordinary pronounced an interlocutor closing the record and assigning a day for the adjustment of issues. The defender reclaimed against this interlocutor, and moved that the cause should be sent to a proof before the Lord Ordinary. The Court refused the reclaiming note on the ground that such a reclaiming note, even if competent, was inconvenient, as the interlocutor reclaimed against left the Lord Ordinary's discretion as to the mode of proof unexercised. Brown v. Virtue & Co., Limited, July 16, 1889, p. 987.

8. In cases where the time for reclaiming expires on a day when the Clerk's office is not open, the provision of the above statute is sufficiently complied with if the reclaiming note is lodged on the first day thereafter on which it is open. Henderson v. Henderson, Oct. 17, 1888, p. 5.

Proof.

10. In an action of damages brought by the beneficiaries under a trust-settlement against the trustees the pursuers averred that in 1857 and 1858 when the trustees entered upon office, the testator's heritable property might have been sold for £42,980, which was sufficient to pay the testator's debts and leave a surplus of £17,000; that instead of selling, the trustees had borrowed £26,000 on the security of the heritage, and that the result was that the trust-estate had proved insufficient to pay debts. The Court remitted to an accountant "to inquire into the amount of the trust-estate from the date of the truster's death, the amount of debts due by the truster and paid by the trustees, and the yearly income and expenditure of the trust, and to report." The accountant reported valuations of the heritage at various dates, and the Court, on the basis of his report, found that if the heritage had been sold soon after the testator's death, the trust-estate would have been insufficient to pay his debts, and assuizied the defenders, on the ground that the pursuers had failed to prove that they had sustained loss. In an appeal the pursuers maintained that as they had not renounced probation, they were entitled to a proof of their averments as to the value of the testator's heritage. The defenders craved that in the event of the pursuers being allowed a proof, they (the defenders) should be allowed a proof of their averments as to the circumstances which led them to borrow. Held that as the pursuers had not renounced probation, they were entitled to a proof of their averment as to the value of the testator's heritage, and that the defenders were entitled to a proof of their averments relating to the circumstances which induced them to borrow on the security of the heritage. Binnie v. Binnie's Trustees, August 8, 1889, H. L., p. 23.

which there was also a conclusion for payment of the aliment of an illegitimate child, held (rev. judgment of Lord Fraser, diss. Lord Shand), that no special cause had been shewn, in terms of the 2d section of the Evidence Act, 1866, why the case should not be tried by a jury. Trotter v. Happer, Nov. 24, 1888, p. 141.

Jury trial—Motion to vary issue—Court of Session Act, 1850, sec. 40—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 28.

12. A Lord Ordinary approved of certain issues, and on the motion of the pursuer, which was not opposed by the defender, by the same interlocutor fixed a day for the trial of the cause. Held that a motion by the defender to vary the terms of the issues was not incompetent. Croucher v. Inglis, June 14, 1889, p. 774.

Jury trial—Competency of trial on one issue pending appeal to House of Lords with view to obtaining second issue—Court of Session Act, 1850, sec. 13.

13. In an action of reduction of missives of sale of a landed estate the pursuer proposed issues of facility and circumvention, and of essential error. The Lord Ordinary appointed the issue of facility and circumvention to be "the issue for the trial of the cause." On a reclaiming note the Court adhered, Lord Shand dissenting, on the ground that the pursuer was entitled to both issues. The pursuer having appealed to the House of Lords, the defender moved the Court to allow the cause to go to a jury on the issue as adjusted, on the ground that the question whether the second issue should be granted was not "necessarily dependent" on the interlocutor appealed against within the meaning of sec. 13 of the Court of Session Act, 1850. The Court refused the motion, the Lord President and Lord Adam doubting whether a trial pending appeal would be competent. Stewart v. Kennedy, June 29, 1889, p. 890.

Jury trial—Abandonment—Decree of absolvitor—Judicature Act, 1825, sec. 10—A. S., 16th Feb. 1841, sec. 46.

14. The pursuer in an action lodged a minute of abandonment, in terms of sec. 10 of the Judicature Act, 1825, after issues were adjusted, but before the trial. Thereafter the Court allowed the defender to lodge an account of his expenses. The pursuer failed to pay the account as taxed. The defender moved for absolvitor. The Court, being satisfied that the pursuer had abandoned the suit, and having regard to sec. 46 of the A. S., 16th Feb. 1841, assolized the defender. Ross v. Mackenzie, June 26, 1889, p. 871.

Multiplepinding—Stolen goods.

15. Necessity for multiplepinding to determine the right to stolen property in possession of a custodian for the public interest. Eaglesham & Company v. Dickson, March 2, 1889, p. 557.

Multiplepinding—Competency.

16. A creditor of a deceased person raised an action against his executor to constitute a claim against the estate which, if found due, would render the estate insolvent, and the executor defended the action. Thereupon another creditor, who maintained that the claim was excessive, raised a process of multiplepinding in name of the executor, calling all the other creditors of the deceased as defenders. It was stated at the bar that the multiplepinding was raised with the consent of the executor. The pursuer of the action of constitution objected to the multiplepinding as incompetent and unnecessary. Objection repelled. Jamieson v. Robertson, Oct. 23, 1888, p. 15.

17. A creditor has no title to claim in a multiplepinding funds to which his debtor has right except by way of a riding claim upon a claim lodged by his debtor. Gill's Trustees v. Patrick and Others, Feb. 6, 1889, p. 403.

Cowan*, Oct. 17, 1888, p. 7.

19. In a reduction of a decree-arbitral on the ground that the arbiter had given decree for a larger sum in name of penalties than was claimed by the party in whose favour decree was granted, the latter offered to discharge the excess. Held that the proper remedy was to reduce the decree quoad the excess. Adams v. Great North of Scotland Railway Co., June 21, 1889, p. 843.

Appeal—Sheriff—Competency—Extract—Sheriff Court Act, 1876, sec. 32.

20. An interlocutor in a Sheriff Court allowed "extract of this decree to go out upon caution being found," and extract was taken on the day after the interlocutor was issued. Held that the words quoted did not restrict the time for appealing, provided by sec. 32 of the Sheriff Court Act of 1876, and meant merely that extract was to go out only upon caution being found. Simpson v. Jack, Nov. 23, 1888, p. 131.

Appeal—Sheriff—Competency—Value of cause—Sheriff Court Act, 1853, sec. 22—Personal Diligence Act, 1838, sec. 30.

21. A Sheriff Court action concluded for warrant to commit the defender to prison "until he restore" certain pointed goods, "or until he pay to the pursuer the sum of £9, 8s. 8d. sterling, being double the appraised value of said articles, all as provided for in the Act 1 and 2 Vict. cap. 114, sec. 30." Held that as the prayer of the petition shewed that the value of the cause did not exceed £25, an appeal to the Court of Session against an interlocutor of the Sheriff dismissing the action was incompetent. Dickson v. Bryan, May 14, 1889, p. 673.

Appeal—Competency—Court of Session Act, 1868, sec. 71—A. S., 10th March 1870, sec. 3—Omission to lodge prints in time.

22. In an appeal in vacation from the Sheriff Court the appellant omitted to lodge prints within fourteen days after the Clerk of Court had received the process, and to box them on the first box-day thereafter, as required by sec. 3, subsec. 2, of A. S., March 10, 1870. An objection having been taken to the competency of the appeal, the Second Division, after consulting with the Judges of the First Division, held (1) that the Court have a discretion as to whether they will enforce the penal provisions of the Act of Sederunt; and (2) that as in the present case the omission was unintentional, and had caused no inconvenience or delay, the objection should be overruled. Boyd, Gilmour, & Co. v. Glasgow and South-Western Railway Co., Nov. 16, 1888, p. 104.

Appeal—Sheriff—Judicature Act, 1825, sec. 40—Act of Sederunt, 12th July 1828, sec. 5.

23. Held that an appeal for jury trial in a Sheriff Court action must, in terms of sec. 5 of A. S., 12th July 1828, be presented within fifteen days after the date of an interlocutor allowing a proof, although the diet for proof is only fixed by an interlocutor of later date. Williams v. Watt & Wilson, May 28, 1889, p. 687.

PROOF. Secondary evidence—Skilled witnesses—Value of colliery.

1. In an action of reduction of a mortis causa trust-settlement and codicil on the ground of facility and circumvention, the Court granted a warrant ordaining the defenders to allow an inspection of the plant, machinery, and working plans of certain collieries—a large share in which belonged to the trust-estate—the object being to obtain evidence of their value for the purposes of the pursuers' case. Bell v. Hamilton's Trustees, July 16, 1889, p. 1001.

sums said to have been paid by him on behalf of his customer, produced receipts by the creditors in the sums said to have been so paid. Held that it was competent to prove by parole that the payments had been made on the authority of the customer. Ross v. Cowie's Executrix, Dec. 14, 1888, p. 224.

Parole—Cautioner—Security to cautioner—Consent by co-cautioner.

3. Where one of several co-cautioners, equally bound by the same deed, claimed the exclusive benefit of a security he had obtained from the principal debtor over part of his estate, on the ground that his co-cautioners had orally agreed to this, held (diss. Lord Lee) that he was entitled to prove this agreement by parole evidence. Hamilton & Co. v. Freeth, July 17, 1889, p. 1022.

Inspection by Court of locus after proof closed.

4. After the close of a proof in a Sheriff Court the Sheriff-substitute, accompanied by the agents of the parties, examined the locus of the events which were the subject of proof in order to see whether it was possible in the circumstances for certain witnesses to have seen the act to which they deponed. Having come to the conclusion that it was impossible, he gave judgment to the effect that the party who relied on their evidence had not established her case. In an appeal, held that the Sheriff-substitute was not entitled to use his own observation of the locus as evidence to contradict the evidence of the witnesses. *Hattie v. The measurements and plan agreed, but they were inconsistent with the boundaries specified. In an action brought by the vassal for declarator that his property extended to the limits shewn by the measurements and plan, *held (diss. PUBLIC BURDENS. Poor-rate—Valuation-roll—Crofters Holdings Act, 1886.

In an action for payment of an assessment of poor-rates laid upon the defender (1) as proprietor and (2) as occupier, in respect of tenants paying under £4 of rent,—the entries in the Valuation-roll being the basis of assessment,—the defender stated that she was unable to recover payment (1) of her rents, and (2) of the rates which she had paid for tenants under £4; that her tenants were crofters, and that prior to the making up of the Valuation-roll they had made application to the Crofters Commission for reductions of rent, which, if granted, would take effect from the date of application, and that the Commission had pronounced an order sisting in hoc statu her right to sell in execution of any decree for rent she might obtain. She maintained that as, subsequent to the date of the Valuation-roll, her only available remedy for the recovery of rents and rates had been suspended by the action of the Crofters Commission under the Crofters Acts, the remedies of the collector for enforcing payment from her of rates founded on the Valuation-roll ought also to be suspended. Held (diss.

PUBLIC HEALTH. Unsound meat—"Possession as or for human food"—Meat consigned by rail to manager of dead meat company—Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, 1879, sec. 261.

A farmer in Perthshire despatched from Crieff Junction in the ordinary course of business the carcase of a bull addressed to the Dead Meat Company, Fountainbridge, Edinburgh. The carcase arrived at the Dead Meat Market, and in consequence of its appearance was examined by the manager of the market and condemned as unfit for human food. The farmer was charged with and convicted of a contravention of the 261st section of the Edinburgh Municipal and Police Act, in respect he had unsound beef in Edinburgh, "in his possession as or for human food." On appeal, the Court (dub. Lord Trayner) quashed the conviction, holding that facts had not been proved sufficient to infer that the accused had the carcase in Edinburgh in his possession either actually or constructively as or for human food. Cairns v. Linton, March 4, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 81.

PUBLIC-HOUSE. Breach of certificate—Keeping open house—Alternative charge and general conviction.

1. A hotel-keeper was charged with a breach of his certificate, in so far as on two occasions he did "keep open house, or sell or give out" liquor during prohibited hours. He was convicted of "the offences charged." In a suspension held that the conviction was a general conviction on an alternative charge, and must therefore be set aside. Duncan v. Laing, Nov. 21, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 20.

Breach of certificate—Name of person to whom liquor sold.

2. It is not essential to the relevancy of a complaint for breach of a public-house certificate by selling or giving out liquors on Sunday that the name of the person to whom the liquor was given out should be stated.

Observed that where the prosecutor knows the name of the person he ought to state it, and where he does not know the words "to the prosecutor unknown" ought to be inserted. Muir v. Campbell, Nov. 21, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 20.

Breach of certificate—Hawking spirits—Selling or giving out on Sunday.

3. The holder of a public-house license received a bottle from a person on a Sunday, outside his licensed premises, and having entered his premises and filled the bottle with whisky, he thereafter, a short distance outside the premises, delivered it to the purchaser. Held that he was properly convicted of a breach of his certificate by selling or giving out liquor on Sunday. Muir v. Campbell, Nov. 21, 1888, Just. Cases, p. 20.

Breach of certificate—Hotel certificate—Bona fide traveller.

4. A resident of the town of Lerwick who had been absent for some months arrived there by steamer early on a Sunday morning, and went home and slept there. At noon of the same day he went to a hotel where he was supplied with refreshments by the waiter, to whom he was unknown, on the mere statement that he had arrived by the steamer, and was a bona fide traveller. Held (1) that he was not a bona fide traveller; (2) that the waiter had not made sufficient inquiry to justify his regarding him as such; (3) that the master of the hotel must be held, in respect of the actings of his servant, to have been guilty of a breach of his certificate. Galloway v. Weber, Jan. 14, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 46.

Breach of certificate—Dominoes played for a stake—"Unlawful game"—Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, Schedule A, No. 2.

5. The Form of Certificate for Public-houses in Schedule A, No. 2 of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, makes it imperative that the person licensed "do not suffer or permit any unlawful games within his premises." A publican was charged and convicted of the offence of having permitted a number of persons "to play at dominoes for a stake, an unlawful game," within his premises. The Court quashed the conviction, holding that the game of dominoes was not "unlawful" in itself, and did not become so by being played for a money stake. Hoggan v. Wood, July 18, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 95.

Certificate—Early-closing licence—Remission of one-seventh of duty—Inland Revenue Act, 1880, sec. 44—Public-Houses Hours of Closing Act, 1887, sec. 4 (b).

6. The licensing authority of Midlothian resolved that from and after Whitsunday 1888, and until the licensing authority shall otherwise determine, all licensed houses within the county "shall be closed at ten o'clock at night." The holder of a certificate which, in terms of that resolution, fixed the hour for closing at ten P.M., raised an action against the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, concluding for repayment of one-seventh of the duty paid by him under protest for his certificate, in respect that the ordinary hour of closing being eleven o'clock he held an "early-closing certificate" within the meaning of section 7 of the Licensing Act, 1874, as extended to Scotland. Held (aff. judgment of Lord Fraser) that under the Licensing Act of 1887 there was no ordinary hour for closing within the district other than that fixed by the magistrates, and that ten o'clock being the hour so fixed, the pursuer was not entitled to the remission claimed. Henderson v. Lord Advocate, Nov. 27, 1888, p. 147.

Complaint—Deviation from statutory form—Trafficking without certificate—Public-Houses Acts Amendment Act, 1862, sec. 17.

7. A B was charged under the 17th section of the Public-Houses Acts Amendment (Scotland) Act, 1862, with trafficking in liquor in L. "without having a certificate, empowering him the said A B to keep premises in L. for the sale of exciseable liquors therein." He was convicted, and in a suspension he averred (and it was admitted) that while he held no certificate for the premises, he was managing them for a person in whose name there was a current certificate, and who had prior to the date of the conviction granted a trust-deed for behoof of creditors. The Court suspended the conviction, holding that as the charge, which was in effect one of trafficking without having obtained a personal certificate, had not been framed in the form prescribed by the 17th section of the Public-Houses (Scotland) Acts Amendment Act, 1862, under which it was brought, and which made it an offence to traffic without having obtained a certificate "in that behalf," the complainer had been debarred from pleading his employer's certificate, and had thus been prejudiced. Wylie v. Thom, July 4, 1889, Just. Cases, p. 90.

Observed per the Lord President,—“The law applicable to appointments ad vitam aut culpam may be summarised thus—Either the appointment must expressly bear that the appointee is to hold his office for life, or the office must be of such a nature that a life appointment is necessarily implied. In this last class are embraced only offices of the nature of munera publica. Public officers are irremovable except for fault. Holders of benefices in the church are public officers, and these offices are munera publica.” Hastie v. M'Murtrie, June 4, 1889, p. 715.

A piece of ground, acquired by a railway company under compulsory powers, had not been used by the company for more than ten years after the completion of their works, and had not been sold by them. It could not be utilised by the company unless they could take additional land from the adjoining proprietor, which was beyond their statutory powers. Held that the ground was superfluous land within the meaning of the 120th section of the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845. *Stewart v. "looser." She stumbled at the top of the ladder and fell, and her leg was wrenched off by the drum of the machine. In an action of damages raised by the girl, with consent of her father, against the contractor, it was proved that it was customary, and was regarded as an adequate precaution against accidents, to have a guard over the drum of such threshing-machines, and that all the machines belonging to the contractor were provided with guards. The Court awarded damages, holding that the machine was defective and dangerous in respect of the want of the guard, and that the injury to the girl was attributable thereto. Edwards v. Hutcheon, May 31, 1889, p. 694.

7. A child of seven years attending a public school was injured through the fall of an iron gate, which formed part of the school premises. The gate was in a defective condition, and fell in consequence of the school children swinging on it. Held that it was the duty of the school board to keep the gate in a safe condition, and that they were liable in damages for the injury. Cormack v. School Board of Wick and Pulteneytown, June 21, 1889, p. 812.

Master and Servant—Reasonable precautions for safety of workmen.

8. A surfaceman in the employment of a railway company was killed, when engaged in work on a siding, by being struck by the tender of an engine which was proceeding, tender first, along the siding towards an engine-shed. It was necessary to take the engine in that way to the engine-shed, and it was not being driven at excessive speed. The engine-driver's view of the place where the deceased and the men working with him were engaged was obstructed by the coals on the tender till it was too late to avert the accident. No other precaution to warn the deceased had been taken than a whistle from the engine, but this, owing to frequent whistling and other noises at the place in question, had not attracted notice. In an action by the widow of the deceased against the railway company for damages for his death, held that the defenders were responsible for the accident, in respect that they had failed to take precautions for securing that the line should be cleared before engines moving tender first were allowed to pass the place at which the accident occurred. Cairns v. Caledonian Railway Company, March 19, 1889, p. 618.
9. A workman engaged in charging an iron smelting furnace was fatally injured by a sudden outburst of flame, caused by the fall of incrustations in the furnace (known as "scaffolds"). The furnace had for about nine months been in a dangerous state from scaffolding, during which period the employer had made various ineffectual attempts to remove the defect. The only remaining remedy was to blow out and clear the furnace, which would have removed, for a time at least, the cause of danger, but would have been expensive. Held that the employer was liable in damages for the workman's death, in respect that there had been fault in allowing the furnace to be worked for so long a period in a dangerous condition. Henderson v. Carron Co., March 19, 1889, p. 633.
10. A brewer sent his men to deliver barrels of beer in a customer's cellar. In elevating one of the barrels into its position in an upper tier one of the men was injured. In an action of damages brought by him against his employer on the ground that the defender had failed to supply the necessary appliances for elevating the barrel, it was proved that the defender had furnished the men with the ordinary appliances, but that the men, finding that these could not be used, owing to the narrowness of the cellar, had, without applying to their master, proceeded to lift the barrels into position. The jury having returned a verdict for the pursuer, the Court granted a new trial, on the ground that there was no evidence of fault. Ramsay v. Robin, McMillan, & Co., May 29, 1889, p. 690.

not be lawful to carry on a white lead factory unless such factory is certified by an inspector to be in conformity with this Act," and (by sec. 3) that a white lead factory shall not be so certified unless certain conditions specified in the schedule to the Act have been complied with. At the date of the passing of the Act the expression "white lead" denoted carbonate of lead, a substance very soluble and therefore dangerous to the health of workmen engaged in its manufacture. After the passing of the Act there was invented a process by which a sulphate of lead having the same appearance and fitted for the same uses could be manufactured. It was sold as white lead. It was nearly insoluble, and was not dangerous to the workmen engaged in its manufacture, if certain simple precautions were observed. A workman who, when engaged in a sulphate of lead factory, suffered from lead-poisoning sued his employers, whose factory was not certified under the Act, for damages, founding on their alleged neglect to conform to the provisions of the Act and to take the various precautions specified in the schedule. Held, after a proof (diss. Lord Lee), that the sulphate of lead was not "white lead" within the meaning of the Act, and that the provisions of the Act, in regard to white lead factories, did not apply; et separatim, that it had not been proved that the pursuer's illness was caused by the failure of the defenders to take proper precautions for the protection of their workmen. *Creedy v. Slander—Privilege—Malice.

13. The chairman of the public health committee of a local authority stated, at a meeting of the committee, that a case of typhoid fever had been reported to him by a medical man, "who said that it was probably to be traced to the milk supplied" by a certain dairyman. In an action of damages against him by the dairyman it was proved that the medical man had not been of that opinion, and had not said so; but that the defender had misunderstood a conversation which he had held with him, and had made the statement in the belief of its truth and in the discharge of his public duty. Held that in these circumstances the defender was entitled to be absolved. McLean v. Adam, Nov. 30, 1888, p. 175.

14. In an action of damages for slander the pursuer alleged that the defender, the minister of the parish in which the pursuer resided, had, by letters written by him to the inspector of poor of another parish and to the Board of Supervision, represented the pursuer as grossly unfit to have the charge of pauper children boarded with him by the parochial board of that other parish. Held that the pursuer was bound to put in issue want of probable cause as well as malice. Croucher v. Inglis, June 14, 1889, p. 774.

15. In an action of damages against the proprietors of a newspaper for slander alleged to be contained in a report in the newspaper of proceedings in a Court of justice, the pursuers averred that certain statements reported to have been made in Court were not made, and that these statements were false and calumnious. The pursuers proposed the following issue:—Whether the defenders published in the newspaper a paragraph in terms of the schedule annexed: "Whether the statements therein set forth are of and concerning the pursuers, and falsely and calumniously represent that the pursuers," &c., "to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuers?" The defenders contended that the pursuers were bound to put malice in the issue, and proposed as a counter issue whether the report was a fair and accurate report of the proceedings. The Court approved the proposed issue, and disallowed

Slander—Newspaper—Circumstances in which slander uttered—Amount of damages.

16. When an action for damages is directed against the publisher of a slander, who is not the writer, he will not be allowed to prove in mitigation of damages circumstances which might have affected the writer, but of which the defender was ignorant, and this rule applies to the publisher of a newspaper who publishes a slander and refuses to disclose the name of the writer. Browne v. McFarlane, Jan. 29, 1889, p. 368.
17. In an action of damages for slander, it is competent for the pursuer as well as for the defender to prove the circumstances in which the slander was written where the defender is the writer,—or published where the defender is the publisher,—as affecting the amount of damages. Cunningham v. Duncan & Jamieson, Feb. 2, 1889, p. 383.

Slander—Newspaper publication.

18. Held by Lord Kinnear, Ordinary, that neither the direct dispatch by post of an English newspaper from the publishing office in England to persons in Scotland, nor the sale of the newspaper in Scotland, is sufficient to give the Scots Courts jurisdiction to entertain an action of damages for slander alleged to have been published in the newspaper. Parnell v. Walter, July 3, 1889, p. 917.

Slander—Issue—Innuendo.

19. An action of damages at the instance of the manager at Ayr Farina Mills was brought against the proprietors of a newspaper for slander alleged to be contained in the following article:—"Fire at Ayr Farina Mills—Singular conduct of the manager.—A fire occurred at a late hour last night in Messrs Hyland & Company's Farina Mills, Ayr, and before the flames were got under damage to the extent of £150 was done. It appears that the proceedings at the fire were somewhat unusual. The alarm was given, and the fire brigade turned out, but on their arrival at the gate of the establishment they were refused admittance by the manager, Mr Gudgeon, who said they could manage the fire themselves. Superintendent M'Kay, the chief of the police, and some of his men were also refused admittance, although the fire was breaking through the roof of the buildings. Superintendent M'Kay and his men eventually got into the premises by climbing over the wall, and the fire brigade seem to have got in by forcing open the gate. They were followed by the crowd. Mr Gudgeon ordered Superintendent M'Kay to take away the hose, but the superintendent said he had no power to do so, and the fire brigade commenced to play on the flames, which were soon got under. . . ." The Court held that the pursuer was entitled to an issue whether the article falsely and calumniously represented that he "had endeavoured to prevent the fire at the works referred to in the said article from being subdued, so as to cause destruction of the said works and stock therein, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer." Gudgeon v. Outram & Co., Dec. 1, 1888, p. 183.
20. The proprietor of a house wrote to the agent of his tenant (Macrae), who had ceased to occupy the premises,—“That horrid man Macrae will never get a penny from me, and you know that as long as he keeps the key he is liable for the rent. There were several applicants for the place at a reduced rent, on account of its being occupied by him. I do believe that he would be mobbed if he was appearing in the Strath. His statement of facts were a tissue of falsehoods.” In an action of damages for slander by the tenant, held that the words would bear the innuendo “that the pursuer is of dishonourable character.” Macrae v. Sutherland, Feb. 9, 1889, p. 476.

21. In an action of damages for slander, the pursuer obtained the following issue:—" (1) Whether, on or about 5th October 1888, within the ring or paddock of the 'Lothians Racing Club and Edinburgh Meeting' at Musselburgh, the defender, in the presence and hearing of" A B "and others, falsely and calumniously said of and concerning the pursuer, 'this is the man who owes me money,' or used words of similar import, meaning that the pursuer was owing him money on betting transactions which he dishonourably refused to pay, and was a person who ought not to be allowed to remain in the said ring or paddock, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer!" The defender proposed the following counter issue:—"Whether the pursuer was owing the defender money on betting transactions which he dishonourably refused to pay!" The pursuer contended that the words "and was a person who ought not to be allowed to remain in the said ring or paddock" should be added to the counter issue. The Court held that those words should be added to the counter issue. Blasquez v. Lothians Racing Club and Reid, June 29, 1889, p. 893.

22. The defender in an action for aliment of an illegitimate child was charged to make payment of the sums contained in a decree in the action. On his failure to implement the decree, a petition was presented to the Sheriff, under the Civil Imprisonment Act, 1882, craving a warrant to commit him to prison. The Sheriff de plano granted warrant to search for and apprehend the debtor, and "to bring him before the Sheriff for examination." The law-agents of the creditor caused the warrant to be executed. In an action for damages at the instance of the debtor against the law-agents, on the ground that they had put in force an illegal warrant, held (1) that the warrant for the debtor's apprehension was illegal, and (2) that the action against the law-agents who executed the warrant was relevant. Cook v. Wallace & Wilson, March 7, 1889, p. 565.

REVENUE. Inhabited house duties—Hunt-kennels—House Tax Act, 1808, schedule B, rule 2—Inhabited House Duty Act, 1851, schedule.

1. The master and committee of subscribers to a pack of fox-hounds were tenants of premises used for the purposes of the hunt—viz., dwelling-houses for the huntsman and whips, stables for twenty horses, kennels for about fifty couples of hounds, and two or three acres of land for exercising, &c. The premises were all in one enclosure, and the cumulo rent was £40, but none of the houses was by itself of the annual value of £20. Held that the premises were liable for inhabited house duty at 9d. per £ under schedule B, rule 2, of the House Tax Act of 1808, and the schedule appended to the Inhabited House Duty Act, 1851. Cheape v. Kinmont, Nov. 27, 1888, p. 144.

Inhabited House Duty—Different tenements let to one tenant for cumulo rent—Verbal lease—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, sec. 13, subsec. 1.

3. In an action at the instance of the Inland Revenue against the executors of a partner of trading company connected with India concluding for additional inventory-duty in respect of the value of the share of the deceased in the company, held that whether the partnership was to be regarded as an Indian or a British partnership, the additional duty was exigible on the ground that the executors being precluded by the contract from holding shares in the partnership, the right vested in them was a right to a sum of money recoverable in this country, diss. Lord Shand, who held that the right vested in the executors at the deceased's death was a share in an Indian company, and that that share was not liable for inventory-duty in the United Kingdom. *Lord Advocate v. 4. A singular successor paid to the superior for his entry a casualty of a year's rent of the lands, without deduction of income-tax. The Crown, after receiving payment from the superior of income-tax on the casualty, assessed the vassal for income-tax on the rent. The vassal objected to the assessment, on the grounds (1) that the superior had received the whole rent for the year, and (2) that a casualty was of the same nature as feu-duty, for which deduction was allowed. The Court sustained the assessment. Macgregor v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Feb. 8, 1889, p. 438.

Income-tax—Fire and Life Insurance Company—Profits or gains—Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842, schedule D, First Case.

5. In a question as to the assessment of income-tax, under the Income-Tax Act, 1842, schedule D, on the profits or gains of a company carrying on the businesses both of fire and life insurance, held (1) that the nett profits and gains from the two branches of the business must be massed together as one undivided income assessable according to the rules applicable to the First Case under schedule D; (2) that in estimating profits and gains there fell to be taken into account interest on investments which had not suffered deduction of income-tax at its source; (3) that as fire insurance policies are contracts for one year only, the premiums received for the year of assessment, or on an average of three years, deducting losses by fire during the same period, and ordinary expenses, may be fairly taken as the profits and gains of the company without making any allowance for the balance of annual risks unexpired at the end of the financial year; (4) that the profits or gains upon the life business could be ascertained by actuarial calculation only, and that this actuarial calculation might be obtained by taking the result of the quinquennial investigation prescribed by statute, or of the periodical investigation in use in companies established before the statute, or by an investigation covering the three years prescribed by schedule D of the Income-Tax Acts; and (5) that where a gain is made by the company (within the year of assessment or the three years prescribed by the Income-Tax Act, schedule D) by realising an investment at a larger price than was paid for it, the difference is to be reckoned among the profits and gains of the company. *Scottish Union and National Insurance Company v. Income-tax—Railway—Expenditure on permanent improvements.

6. A railway company, in making their return for assessment of income-tax, claimed as deductions from the revenue of the year of assessment (1) a sum expended upon the improvement of the permanent way of a line of railway which they had acquired and amalgamated with their concern, in order to bring it up to the standard of the rest of the line; (2) a sum representing the cost of the extra weight in relaying part of the main line with steel in place of iron rails, and with chairs of additional weight. In the books of the company, these sums were charged against capital. The Commissioners of Income-tax disallowed the sums as deductions from revenue, holding that they were properly chargeable to capital. On appeal, the Court affirmed their determination. Highland Railway Co. v. Special Commissioners of Income-Tax, July 10, 1889, p. 950.

1. Held that a bond and disposition in security binding the granter to purchase and to transfer to the grantee the capital stock or sum of £5000 3 per cent Consolidated Bank Annuities, and until such purchase and transfer to pay to the grantee the interest payable on that amount of stock, was effectual to make these obligations real burdens on the lands conveyed. Edmonstone v. Seton, Oct. 16, 1888, p. 1.

burgh, the defender, in the presence and hearing of" A B "and others, falsely and calumniously said of and concerning the pursuer, 'this is the man who owes me money,' or used words of similar import, meaning that the pursuer was owing him money on betting transactions which he dishonourably refused to pay, and was a person who ought not to be allowed to remain in the said ring or paddock, to the loss, injury, and damage of the pursuer!" The defender proposed the following counter issue:—"Whether the pursuer was owing the defender money on betting transactions which he dishonourably refused to pay?" The pursuer contended that the words "and was a person who ought not to be allowed to remain in the said ring or paddock" should be added to the counter issue. The Court held that those words should be added to the counter issue. Blasquez v. Lothians Racing Club and Reid, June 29, 1889, p. 893.

Apprehension and imprisonment for civil debt—Necessity for notice of petition for warrant to imprison—Civil Imprisonment Act, 1882, secs. 3 and 4.

22. The defender in an action for aliment of an illegitimate child was charged to make payment of the sums contained in a decree in the action. On his failure to implement the decree, a petition was presented to the Sheriff, under the Civil Imprisonment Act, 1882, craving a warrant to commit him to prison. The Sheriff de plano granted warrant to search for and apprehend the debtor, and "to bring him before the Sheriff for examination." The law-agents of the creditor caused the warrant to be executed. In an action for damages at the instance of the debtor against the law-agents, on the ground that they had put in force an illegal warrant, held (1) that the warrant for the debtor's apprehension was illegal, and (2) that the action against the law-agents who executed the warrant was relevant. Cook v. Wallace & Wilson, March 7, 1889, p. 565.

REVENUE. Inhabited house duties—Hunt-kennels—House Tax Act, 1808, schedule B, rule 2—Inhabited House Duty Act, 1851, schedule.

1. The master and committee of subscribers to a pack of fox-hounds were tenants of premises used for the purposes of the hunt—viz., dwelling-houses for the huntsman and whips, stables for twenty horses, kennels for about fifty couples of hounds, and two or three acres of land for exercising, &c. The premises were all in one enclosure, and the cumulo rent was £40, but none of the houses was by itself of the annual value of £20. Held that the premises were liable for inhabited house duty at 9d. per £ under schedule B, rule 2, of the House Tax Act of 1808, and the schedule appended to the Inhabited House Duty Act, 1851. Cheape v. Kinmont, Nov. 27, 1888, p. 144.

Inhabited House Duty—Different tenements let to one tenant for cumulo rent—Verbal lease—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1878, sec. 13, subsec. 1.

2. Held that the exemption provided in the above statute applied in a case where different tenements (one of which was used solely for business purposes) were let to the same tenant from year to year under a verbal lease at a cumulo rent. Allan v. Miller, March 6, 1889, p. 557.

Inventory-duty—Share in trading company—Foreign.

3. In an action at the instance of the Inland Revenue against the executors of a partner of trading company connected with India concluding for additional inventory-duty in respect of the value of the share of the deceased in the company, held that whether the partnership was to be regarded as an Indian or a British partnership, the additional duty was exigible on the ground that the executors being precluded by the contract from holding shares in the partnership, the right vested in them was a right to a sum of money recoverable in this country, disa. Lord Shand, who held that the right vested in the executors at the deceased's death was a share in an Indian company, and that that share was not liable for inventory-duty in the United Kingdom. Lord Advocate v. Laidlay's Trustees, July 12, 1889, p. 959.

REVENUE—Continued.

4. A singular successor paid to the superior for his entry a casualty of a year's rent of the lands, without deduction of income-tax. The Crown, after receiving payment from the superior of income-tax on the casualty, assessed the vassal for income-tax on the rent. The vassal objected to the assessment, on the grounds (1) that the superior had received the whole rent for the year, and (2) that a casualty was of the same nature as feu-duty, for which deduction was allowed. The Court sustained the assessment. Macgregor v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Feb. 8, 1889, p. 438.

Income-tax—Fire and Life Insurance Company—Profits or gains—Property and Income-Tax Act, 1842, schedule D, First Case.

5. In a question as to the assessment of income-tax, under the Income-Tax Act, 1842, schedule D, on the profits or gains of a company carrying on the businesses both of fire and life insurance, held (1) that the nett profits and gains from the two branches of the business must be massed together as one undivided income assessable according to the rules applicable to the First Case under schedule D; (2) that in estimating profits and gains there fall to be taken into account interest on investments which had not suffered deduction of income-tax at its source; (3) that as fire insurance policies are contracts for one year only, the premiums received for the year of assessment, or on an average of three years, deducting losses by fire during the same period, and ordinary expenses, may be fairly taken as the profits and gains of the company without making any allowance for the balance of annual risks unexpired at the end of the financial year; (4) that the profits or gains upon the life business could be ascertained by actuarial calculation only, and that this actuarial calculation might be obtained by taking the result of the quinquennial investigation prescribed by statute, or of the periodical investigation in use in companies established before the statute, or by an investigation covering the three years prescribed by schedule D of the Income-Tax Acts; and (5) that where a gain is made by the company (within the year of assessment or the three years prescribed by the Income-Tax Act, schedule D) by realising an investment at a larger price than was paid for it, the difference is to be reckoned among the profits and gains of the company. Scottish Union and National Insurance Company v. Inland Revenue, Feb. 8, 1889, p. 461.

Income-tax—Railway—Expenditure on permanent improvements.

6. A railway company, in making their return for assessment of income-tax, claimed as deductions from the revenue of the year of assessment (1) a sum expended upon the improvement of the permanent way of a line of railway which they had acquired and amalgamated with their concern, in order to bring it up to the standard of the rest of the line; (2) a sum representing the cost of the extra weight in relaying part of the main line with steel in place of iron rails, and with chairs of additional weight. RIGHT IN SECURITY. Real Burden—Obligation ad factum præstandum—Obligation to purchase and transfer consols.

1. Held that a bond and disposition in security binding the grantor to purchase and to transfer to the grantee the capital stock or sum of £5000 3 per cent Consolidated Bank Annuities, and until such purchase and transfer to pay to the grantee the interest payable on that amount of stock, was effectual to make these obligations real burdens on the lands conveyed. Edmonstone v. Seton, Oct. 16, 1888, p. 1.

2. Held that the creditor in a bond and disposition in security, in the form prescribed by the Titles to Land Consolidation Act, 1868, is entitled to recover his debt either by proceeding on the personal obligation, or by exercising the power of sale contained in the bond. M'Nab v. Clarke, March 16, 1889, p. 610.

Mailles and duties—Heritable creditor.

3. When a heritable creditor has obtained a decree of mailles and duties against the tenants on an estate in an action in which the proprietor has been called for his interest, and has not appeared, he is thereafter in possession of the estate, and has a good title to use sequestration for rent against any one subsequently possessing as tenant, although he may not have been called in the action of mailles and duties. Robertson's Trustees v. Gardner, May 31, 1889, p. 705.

Right in security—Personal action—Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company Act, 1856.

4. Held (aff. judgment of First Division) that the Scottish Drainage and Improvement Company Act, 1856, imposes no personal liability upon a landowner to whom advances are made under the Act, and that a personal action against such landowner for payment of the annual rent charge is incompetent. Scottish Drainage and Improvement Co. v. Campbell, June 24, 1889, H. L., p. 16.

*See Foreign, 1—Pounding.SALE. Offer and acceptance—Qualification of offer—Consensus in idem.

1. N. wrote this letter to A.,—"I hereby offer to purchase the following parts of the tenement . . . known as His Lordship's Larder . . . ." The parts were described in detail, and a price was named. A. replied,—"I hereby accept your offer, as copied on the other side, . . . for our interest in the property known as His Lordship's Larder." On examination of the titles it appeared that A. had no clear and indisputable title to certain portions of the subjects specially described. In an action by N. to enforce implement, the Court assolized A., on the ground that the missives did not constitute a completed contract for the purchase and sale of the subjects. Nelson v. Assets Co., Limited, July 3, 1889, p. 898.

Suspensive condition—Sale or hire—Contract.

2. M. & Co., a firm of piano sellers, entered into the following contract with A:—"In consideration of M. & Co. (hereinafter called the owners) letting to the undersigned (hereinafter called the hirer) a harmonium (hereinafter called the goods) on hire, the hirer hereby agrees to pay to the owners the sum of £1, 10s. on delivery of the goods, as deposit, and a further sum of £1 every four weeks thereafter, as hire, until the full amount of £15, 15s. (including the deposit) shall have been paid, when the goods shall be the property of the hirer, without any further payment whatever." A paid the deposit, and made one of the monthly payments. She then left the country, and her goods were sold by public auction. At the sale G. bought the harmonium, and obtained delivery. In an action for delivery of the harmonium at the instance of M. & Co. against G., the Court granted decree of delivery as craved on the ground that the contract was one of sale under the suspensive condition that the property in the harmonium should not pass till the full price was paid, and that the condition not having been fulfilled, G.'s title was bad. Murdoch & Co., Limited, v. Greig, Feb. 6, 1889, p. 396.

3. Certain creditors of an insolvent agreed to accept a composition of 8s. per pound in full of their claims. A, the insolvent's mother-in-law, one of the creditors, took his furniture, as valued by an appraiser, in part payment of her composition. The furniture remained in his possession on a verbal agreement that his wife and he should have the use of it. Two years afterwards his estates were sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Act. In a question between A's representatives and the trustee in the sequestration held that under section 1 of the Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856, the former were entitled to delivery of the furniture, as having been sold to A but not delivered. Scott v. Scott's Trustee, Feb. 20, 1889, p. 504.

Property—Description by boundaries inconsistent with measurements—Plan.

4. A feu-contract described the subject by boundaries. It also described it by measurements, and referred to a plan or sketch annexed. The measurements and plan agreed, but they were inconsistent with the boundaries specified. In an action brought by the vassal for declarator that his property extended to the limits shewn by the measurements and plan, held that the description by boundaries must prevail, and defenders assolizied. Currie v. Campbell's Trustees, Dec. 18, 1888, p. 237.

Assignment of rents—Shooting rents.

5. Where certain heritable subjects were sold during the subsistence of a shooting lease, held (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner, Ordinary) that the shooting tenant's rent fell to be apportioned between the seller and purchaser according as the right of shooting was exercised before or after the purchaser's term of entry to the subjects. Lord Glasgow's Trustees v. Clark, Feb. 27, 1889, p. 545.

Assignment of rents—Legal and conventional terms—Seller and Purchaser.

6. The seller of certain heritage, consisting of two farms, assigned to the purchaser the rents "due and payable from and after the term of entry," which was Martinmas 1886. In a question as to the right to the farm rents payable at Whitsunday 1887 for the crop and year 1886, held (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner, Ordinary) that the proportion applicable to the possession prior to Martinmas 1886 belonged to the seller, and that applicable to the possession subsequent thereto to the purchaser. Lord Glasgow's Trustees v. Clark, Feb. 27, 1889, p. 545.

Constructive delivery—Possession—Bonded warehouse.

7. A, a distiller sold certain parcels of whisky to B, who paid the price, leaving the whisky undelivered in A's bonded warehouse, where none but whisky from his own distillery was kept. The whisky was sold by B to a purchaser, and there were subsequently several other subsales, extending over a period of six years—a delivery-order being in each case intimated to A, who noted the transfer in his books and intimated to the transferee that he would be charged warehouse rent. C, the last subvendee, having become bankrupt, the trustee upon his sequestrated estate demanded delivery from A of the whisky, which had all along remained in A's warehouse at a specified rent. Held (by the Lord President, Lords Adam and Kinnear, diss. Lords Mure and Shand, and rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that A continued undivested owner of the whisky, and therefore had a right to retain it for a debt due to him by C. Distillers Co., Limited, v. Russell's Trustees, Feb. 9, 1889, p. 479.

Payment—Conditional payment—Repetition.

8. S., a merchant, agreed to buy sixty tons of potatoes from a farmer. Subsequently he was informed by the seller that his crop and stock had been previously sequestrated at the instance of his landlord. S. thereupon entered into an agreement with the farmer, and with the landlord's factor, by which he agreed to prepay the price of the goods to the factor, to be applied in payment of the farmer's rent. S. sent a cheque for the amount to the factor, which he requested him to acknowledge "by receipt as per copy enclosed." This copy ran thus,—"Received from S. the sum of £120 in full payment of sixty tons of potatoes . . . which I bind and oblige myself to deliver." The factor retained and cashed the cheque, but refused to guarantee delivery of the goods. S. thereafter repudiated the contract, and raised an action against him for redelivery of the cheque, or for repayment of the amount thereof. The Court held that as the pursuer had sent the cheque expressly on the understanding that the defender should guarantee delivery of the goods, the latter was not entitled to retain it or its proceeds, and ordered it to be repaid. Semple v. Wilson, June 14, 1889, p. 790.

SCHOOL. Schoolmaster—Retiring allowance—School Board—Parochial teacher's house—Education Act, 1872, secs. 23, 60, 61.

1. A parochial teacher appointed prior to 1872 agreed with the school board that in consequence of age and infirmity he should resign office, on condition of receiving during life a certain annual sum, and the free use of the teacher's house and garden, which he had occupied for many years. Certain ratepayers objected to the arrangement as ultra vires of the board, in respect (1) that the school board were not entitled to allow a larger money allowance than that to which the teacher would have been entitled on removal for inefficiency without fault under section 60 of the Education Act, 1872; and (2) that they were not entitled to divert the teacher's house from its proper use. Held that the school board had acted within their powers. School Board of Eckford v. Rutherford, Feb. 2, 1889, p. 377.

Educational Endowments Act, 1882—Summary dismissal of pupil.

2. Held that the headmaster of a school, which was regulated by a scheme under the above Act, was acting within the powers conferred upon him by the scheme when he summarily dismissed from the school a foundationer whom the medical officers reported as suffering from an attack of leprosy, which, in their opinion, might be communicated to the rest of the school. Piggott v. Governors of the Fettes Trust, Dec. 11, 1888, p. 199.

SHERIFF. Process—Jurisdiction—Lease—Summary ejection for failure to stock.

1. In a Sheriff Court petition by the landlord of a farm for warrant to sequester and sell his tenant's effects for rent past due, and for an order on the tenant to replenish the farm if necessary, decree of sale was pronounced of consent, and the sale having exhausted the subjects, the landlord moved for an order on the tenant to re-stock, and on his failure to do so within fourteen days, for decree of summary ejection, and warrant to re-let. The tenant by minute stated that he was proceeding to stock. The Sheriff in respect of this minute remitted to a man of skill to see the stocking carried out, and to report within one month. The man of skill reported at the end of the month that the farm had not been re-stocked. The Sheriff thereupon granted warrant for summary ejection. In an action for reduction of this warrant by the tenant, held (diss. Lord Young) that as the Sheriff had not fixed a time within which the re-stocking must be carried out, the tenant was not in default, and that decree of reduction of the warrant to eject fell in consequence to be pronounced.

Question, whether the Sheriff has jurisdiction to grant warrant for the summary ejection of the tenant of an agricultural subject on account of failure to stock. Opinion per Lord Young that he has. Macdonald v. Mackessack, Nov. 30, 1888, p. 168.

Summons—Amendment—Sheriff Court Act, 1876.

2. Held that a summons raised in the Sheriff Court by a widow in her individual capacity could not on her being subsequently decerned executrix-dative to her husband, be amended so as to admit of her suing also as executrix, the power of amendment given in sec. 24 of the Sheriff Court Act, 1876, not being applicable to such a case. Turnbull v. Veitch, July 18, 1889, p. 1079.

Process—Extract—Sheriff Court Act, 1876, sec. 32.

3. An interlocutor in a Sheriff Court allowed "extract of this decree to go out upon caution being found," and extract was taken on the day after the interlocutor was issued. Held that the words quoted did not restrict the time for appealing, and meant only that extract was not to go out until after the fourteen days provided by the above Act, and then only upon caution being found. Simpson v. Jack, Nov. 23, 1888, p. 131.

Process—Decree conform—Crofters Holdings Act, 1886, secs. 25, 27, 28.

4. When an order of the Crofters Commission is presented to a Sheriff, with a request for a decree conform, the Sheriff, if satisfied that the order is in conformity with the statute, and has been duly recorded, should, without further procedure, grant decree conform. Duke of Argyll v. Cameron, Nov. 24, 1888, p. 139.

See Justiciary Cases, 4—Reparation, 22.

SHIP. Charter-party—Cesser and lien clauses—Demurrage.

1. A charter-party provided "charterers' responsibility to cease on cargo being loaded, provided the cargo is worth the freight at port of discharge. Owners to have lien on cargo for freight, dead-freight, and demurrage. To be loaded as customary at Sydney. To be discharged as customary at . . . and at the rate of not less than 100 tons of coals per working-day, . . . and ten days on demurrage over and above the said laying-days, at 4d. per register ton per day." In an action brought by the owners against the charterers for damages for detention at the port of loading, the defenders founded on the cesser and lien clauses as freeing them from responsibility. Held that the word "demurrage" in the lien clause did not cover undue detention at the port of loading, and therefore that the charterers were not exempted by the cesser clause from liability for damages for such detention. Gardiner v. Macfarlane, M'Crindell, & Co., March 20, 1889, p. 658.

Charter-party—Freight—Hire payable in advance—General average.

2. In a charter-party the charterer became bound to pay hire for a steam-vessel at a certain rate per month, and the owners to provide the officers and crew and stores. It was stipulated that "in the event of loss of time from deficiency of men or stores, break-down of machinery, want of repairs, or damage, whereby the working of the vessel is stopped for more than forty-eight consecutive working hours, the payment of hire shall cease until she be again in an efficient state to resume her service." On 30th September 1887, on a voyage from the West Coast of Africa to Harburg, the high-pressure engine broke down, and the vessel put in to Las Palmas in the Canary Isles, where she was pronounced to be unfit to proceed on her voyage. As repairs could not be effected in that port, the owners and charterers arranged to send from England a tug to bring the ship to Harburg, it being agreed that the cost should be treated as general average. The ship arrived at the port of discharge by the use of her low-pressure engine and with the assistance of the tug. The charterer paid £867 as his share of general average. In an action by the shipowner against the charterer for hire of the ship from the time she left Las Palmas with the assistance of the tug till she was discharged, held (1) (rev. judgment of Lord Trayner) that the ship had not been "in an efficient state" from the time of the accident, and that in terms of the charter-party the owner had no claim to hire for the subsequent voyage, but (2) (dub. Lord Young) that the charterers must pay hire for the period during which she was necessarily engaged in discharging her cargo at the port of arrival. Hogarth v. Miller, Brother, & Co., March 15, 1889, p. 599.

Charter-party—Seaworthiness—Exception—"Error or negligence of navigation"—Onus.

3. The charter-party of a steamship freed the owners from liability for "the act of God, the Queen's enemies, fire, and all and every other dangers and accidents of the seas, rivers, and errors or negligence of navigation of whatsoever nature and kind, during the said voyage." The vessel was lost through failure of steam-power, in consequence of which she drifted on a lee shore. In an action at the instance of the charterers against the owners for damages for the loss of the cargo, the Court (rev. judgment of Lord Kinnear) held (1) upon the evidence that the failure of steam-power was attributable to the water having been allowed to run too low in the boiler, so that the metal surfaces of the crowns of the wing furnaces and some of the boiler tubes were denuded of water, with the result that they contracted unevenly, and consequently leaked, when cold sea-water was admitted into the boiler, and (2) that the loss fell under the exception of "errors or negligence of navigation" in the charter-party, and that therefore the owners were not liable in damages. Cunningham v. Colvils, Lowden, & Co., Dec. 21, 1888, p. 295.

Charter-party—Guarantee that ship should carry a certain dead-weight—Stowage of machinery and coal.

4. By a charter-party it was agreed that the vessel should proceed to G, and there load "all such goods and merchandise as the charterers" should tender alongside, "not exceeding what she can reasonably stow and carry"; that the charterers should pay a lump sum for the voyage of £2200; that the "owners guarantee that the vessel should carry not less than 2000 tons dead-weight of cargo"; that, "should the vessel not carry the guaranteed dead-weight as above, any expense incurred from this cause to be borne by the owners, and a pro rata reduction per ton to be made" from the freight. At the time the charter-party was signed, this unsigned note was put upon it with consent of the parties, "including machinery, the largest pieces measure about say,"—the dimensions and weight of twenty-five pieces of machinery were then given. The charterers tendered 2000 tons of cargo, consisting partly of large pieces of machinery, including, in addition to the twenty-five pieces mentioned in the note, sixty additional pieces of the same description, and partly of coal and partly of general cargo. In consequence of the large space required by the machinery, which was stowed separately, only 1691 tons were shipped. Had the coals and machinery been stored together, the vessel would have held the 2000 tons. In an action for payment of the balance of freight, the charterers claimed deduction in respect of the 309 tons not shipped, on the grounds (1) that by the contract the freight was limited to the dead-weight actually carried, and (2) that the short shipment was due to improper stowage. Held (rev. judgment of the Second Division) that, as the owners had provided a vessel capable of carrying a dead-weight of 2000 tons, and as the short shipment was not due to improper stowage, but to the charterers providing a cargo more bulky than that contemplated by the parties when they entered into the contract, the charterers were not entitled to any deduction from the full freight. Mackill & Co. v. Wright Brothers & Co., Dec. 18, 1888, H. L., p. 1.

Right of Mortgagees—Charter-party.

5. The owner of a ship, over which he has granted a mortgage, is not entitled to deal with the ship as owner, in such way as may materially prejudice the mortgagee's security. Laming & Co. v. Seater, June 21, 1889, p. 828.

Arrestment—Recall of arrestment—Caution or consignment for expenses.

6. In a petition at the instance of the owners of a ship praying the Court to recall arrestments laid on the ship upon the dependence of an action against them for payment of £176, and to prohibit any further arrestment on the dependence of the same action, the Court recalled the arrestments and prohibited further arrestments as prayed for on the petitioners finding caution for £200 or consigning that sum. M'Phedron and Currie v. M'Callum, Oct. 31, 1888, p. 45.

issued with any security." Held that that exemption did not cover interest coupons which were attached to the original security upon its being renewed by minute for a further term of years after its original term of endurance had expired, and that they fell to be stamped with the 1d. stamp. Australasian Mortgage and Agency Co., Limited, v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Nov. 9, 1888, p. 64.

Transfer of debenture—Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, sec. 13—Stamp Act, 1870, sec. 2—Marketable security.

2. By the Stamp Act, 1870, and the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, a marketable security is defined as meaning "a security of such a description as to be capable of being sold in any stock market in the United Kingdom." Held that debentures of a land and cattle company incorporated under the Companies Acts fell within that definition, and that transfers on sales thereof were therefore liable, under the 13th section of the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1888, to a stamp-duty of 10s. per cent on the price as conveyances on sale. Texas Land and Cattle Co., Limited, v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Nov. 9, 1888, p. 69.

SUCCESSION. Legitim—Right to deduct aliment to widow.

1. A husband died, leaving a will by which he gave his widow a liferent of his whole estate, with power to appropriate such part of the capital as from time to time she should think necessary for her maintenance. Some months after the husband's death a child claimed legitim. Held that the widow was not entitled in the accounting for legitim to credit for aliment out of the estate from her husband's death till the demand for legitim was made. Morrison v. Tawse's Executrix, Dec. 18, 1888, p. 247.

Legitim—Liferent and Fee—Effect of parent's repudiation of liferent on children's fee.

2. One of the daughters (of the testator) having repudiated the provisions in her favour and claimed legitim, terms of trust-deed under which held (1) that on a construction of the special terms of the deeds the daughter by her repudiation forfeited not only her own rights under the settlement but those of her heirs and successors; (2) that the repudiated share of residue fell to be divided, in terms of the deed, amongst those beneficiaries who had not repudiated. Campbell's Trustees v. Campbell, July 17, 1889, p. 1007.

3. A right to legitim is a debt to be measured by the actual value of the moveable estate left by the father at his death, and its ascertainment does not involve realisation of his estate.

In an action for payment of legitim the Lord Ordinary, Fraser, while recognising the rule that legitim is to be calculated on the value of the estate at the date of the father's death, held that shares of certain ships which were not marketable at the date of the father's death, but soon after increased in value, were to be estimated at the increased value, and allowed a proof "of the market price at the present time."

The Court recalled the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor, and allowed a proof of the value of the shares of ships as at the date of the father's death (dub. Lord Shand, who was of opinion that the pursuer was entitled to have the estate valued as on a fair realisation six months after the father's death).

Opinion (per Lord Adam) that the question whether the price realised by the sale of one of the ships three months after the father's death was to be taken as its value in estimating legitim depended on whether the ships were then being held for the beneficiaries or for the purpose of realising as at the date of the father's death. Gilchrist v. Gilchrist Trustees, July 19, 1889, p. 1118.

Legitim—Interest.

4. Held (per Lord Fraser) that interest at five per cent is due upon a claim for legitim which an executor delays to pay without justifiable excuse. Gilchrist v. Gilchrist's Trustees, July 19, 1889, p. 1118.

Heritable and Moveable—Conversion—Terce and jus relictæ.

5. A bondholder infest sold the security subjects under his bond, but died before granting a disposition. His widow maintained that the bond formed part of her husband's moveable estate at the date of his death, subject to jus relictæ. Held that the bond had not been rendered moveable in a question between the executor and the widow. Rossborough's Trustees v. Rossborough, Nov. 28, 1888, p. 157.

Heritable and Moveable—Incidence of debts—Lease.

6. A testator in his trust-settlement directed his trustees to pay the income of the residue of his estate to his sister and her children, and after her death, and when the youngest attained the age of twenty-five years, to divide the capital of the residue among them. He was tenant under lease of a music-hall, and when he died some years of the lease were still to run. His trustee failed to dispose of the lease or to sublet the premises. His widow claimed her legal rights. Held that the loss occasioned by the lease of the music-hall fell to be charged (1) against the moveable estate in a question with the widow, and (2) against the fee of the residue of the estate in a question between the liferentrix and fiars under the settlement. Rossborough's Trustees v. Rossborough, Nov. 28, 1888, p. 157.

Heritable or Moveable—Conversion.

7. A testator conveyed his heritable and moveable estates to trustees with directions to pay to his wife, in case she survived him, a liferent of the trust-estate, and "to pay" to her "for her own use and disposal, out of the capital of the trust-estate any sum or sums of money she may require, not exceeding in all the one equal half of the residue and remainder of the trust-estate, and that at any time, or from time to time, as she may desire." He further directed his trustees, at the first term which should happen six months after her death, "to pay and assign to her heirs, executors, and assignees the balance, if any, which shall remain unpaid to her of the equal half" of the residue. The other half was to be divided into six shares and paid to certain relatives. For accomplishing the purposes of the trust he gave his trustees power to sell his whole estate, heritable and moveable. The widow received the liferent, but never applied for or received any payment from the capital. She died, leaving a will conveying her "moveable estate." In a question between her heir-at-law and the executors under her will as to whether her right to one-half of the price realised from heritage belonging to the trust-estate, and unsold at her death, was heritable or moveable, held that it was moveable, and was carried by her will. Kippen's Trustees, March 20, 1889, p. 669.

Legacy—Charitable bequest—Uncertainty.

8. A testator bequeathed a sum to found bursaries for behoof of "residents in the parish of Alves, or in the parish and burgh of Elgin." The parish of Elgin extended beyond the burgh, and parts of the burgh were outside that parish. Held that the description included residents in any part of the parish or of the burgh. Anderson's Bursary Trustees v. Sutherland, March 7, 1889, p. 574.

Legacy—Falsa demonstratio.

9. A truster, by his trust-disposition and settlement, directed his trustees to pay or make over to each of three of his daughters one-fifth share of the residue and remainder of his means and estate, "the said shares to be at the absolute disposal of my said three daughters respectively." By subsequent codicil he "revoked and altered" his settlement "to this extent, that, in place of the absolute power therein given to" his three daughters, "I restrict that absolute power in each case to one half of their respective shares of my heritable estate, and in respect of the other half none of them shall have power to deal with it during their respective lifetime, beyond the interest or revenue derived from it; but they shall have power, by any deed or writing duly executed by them, to will the same over after their death to such person or persons or such objects as they may think proper, my object in making this restriction being that they shall not by any act on their part deprive themselves of a fair livelihood during their lifetime." The trustor's moveable estate amounted to £175,000, and his heritable estate to £8000. In a special case between the trustees and the three daughters held (1) that the words "shares of my heritable estate" applied to shares of the testator's whole estate whether heritable or moveable. Clouston's Trustees v. Bulloch, July 5, 1889, p. 937.

10. A testatrix by her settlement directed her trustees to divide the residue of her estate equally between her two daughters, who were married, "and to their respective heirs and assignees, but declaring that the provision hereby made . . . is an alimentary provision for their own separate use and behoof, and shall not be subject to the jus mariti or right of administration or management of their husbands, . . . but my trustees shall be bound to see to the investment of the said residue for my said daughters in such way and manner as shall to them appear best to secure and give effect to the foresaid declarations and conditions." Held that the fee of the residue was vested in the daughters, and that they were entitled to have the residue paid over to them upon their own receipts, the receipts to bear the exclusion of the jus mariti and right of administration. Jamieson v. Lesslie's Trustees, June 19, 1889, p. 807.
11. A testator appointed trustees, and left his property to be divided equally among his three children—two daughters and a son—providing that "any share that my daughter M. may receive to go direct to her and her children. Failing the above mentioned, her share to return to her nearest of kin, except her husband shall have the liferent. My daughter H.'s share I settle in like manner, excepting in the event of her decease without issue her share shall return to her nearest of kin. Also my trustees shall retain charge of her share. It is not to go into her hands. The same with reference to my son C., his share to remain in the hands of my trustees for his behoof. In the event of his demise, his share to return to his nearest of kin." Held that the fee of each of the shares vested at the testator's death in his three children respectively; that the trustees were bound to pay over M.'s share to her at once; but that they were bound to retain the shares of H. and C. for their behoof. Christie's Trustees v. Murray's Trustees, July 3, 1889, p. 913.
12. A testatrix, in her trust-disposition and settlement, left the residue of her estate to certain persons named, equally, the said shares of residue to vest at the death of the testatrix, "declaring that the share falling to any of the said residuary legatees who are females and may be married at the time of my death shall be held by my said trustees, or invested for their behoof, exclusive of the jus mariti of their then or any other husband they may afterwards marry, and the annual produce of said share of residue paid to said legatee during her life, and at her death the principal sum shall be paid to her heirs or executors." Held that the fee of the shares of females who were married at the death of the testatrix vested in them at her death, and that they were entitled to immediate payment thereof. Duthie's Trustees v. Forlong, July 17, 1889, p. 1002.
13. A trustor directed his trustees to divide his estate into shares in a certain manner, "said shares to be payable to my said children as soon as my estate shall be realised and converted into cash." In the event of the death of any of the children before receiving payment of their shares without leaving lawful issue, the share of such decesser was to be divided among the surviving children or their issue. By a codicil he directed his trustees "to invest the shares of my means and estate falling to my daughters," so soon as the same is realised and can be invested, upon heritable security, taking conceived in favour of such daughters in liferent for their ly, and to the child or children of their bodies, if more among them in fee"; declaring that such liferent provisionally alimentary, exclusive of the jus mariti, but with the daughters, by writing under her hand, to continue her hand, and to apportion the fee among her children. A married died without issue, predeceased by her husband, . She had not received payment of her share. Held and codicil taken together conferred upon each daughter a morte testatoris, subject only to a restriction in favour of the event of her having such. Dalglish's Trustees v. Dalglish, March 6, 1889, p. 559.

and codicil under which held that as there was a clear intention in the trust-settlement to pay over the daughters' direction was not recalled, and no machinery was provided for the provisions of the codicil, the trustees were not to take any part of the shares,—diss. Lord Adam, who was of opinion that the terms of the codicil amounted to a revocation of the trust as regards one half of each daughter's share, and an order to hold that half for her in liferent, and on her death to pay to the trustees as they have directed. Clouston's Trustees v. Bulloch, July 17, 1889, p. 1007.

She came party to a bond and assignation in security, whereby she gave security of a loan, assigned his interest under the bond to the lender, and his mother, in farther security, apportioned one-fifth of the fund and declared the apportionment to be binding leaving no other deed expressly bearing to be an answer. By her trust-disposition and settlement she left one of her daughters, and appointed the residue of her estate to be divided equally among her children other than this daughter, and provided that the provisions should be in full satisfaction "of all claims in my decease, whether legally or under my marriage-contract in any manner of way." In a special case, held that the bond in security contained a valid exercise of the power of apportionment of one-fifth of the fund; that the trust-disposition was binding with the lady's own estate only, and not with the fund of her husband, which consequently was as regarded four-fifths until that extent fell to be divided equally among all the children, and the son to whom the fifth had been apportioned. Paterson, July 16, 1889, p. 983.

marriage-contract the wife conveyed to herself in liferent, and her husband in liferent, exclusive of the jus mariti, and the children of the marriage in fee, certain bank shares, and the husband, and failing his exercising it, in the provisions made for them among the children. There were two sons and one son. By his settlement the husband conveyed to trustees to pay certain special legacies to the sons, and the residue of the whole residue and remainder of my estate, to be paid to my son, declaring that he had made use of the powers in the marriage-contract. The husband and wife, who thereafter executed a transfer of the bank shares and the children equally among them, and assigned in security to a creditor his whole interest "in the residue and remainder of the heritable and moveable estate of the said deceased G. W." (his father), "and all my right and interest of whatever kind or description under the same." In a question between the son and the assignee—held that the latter had no right to the bank shares, these having formed no part of the father's estate, and the father's settlement not being an effectual exercise of the power. Whyte v. Murray, Nov. 16, 1888, p. 95.

18. A trustor by his trust-settlement, inter alia, directed his trustees, so soon as they should see fit, to convey certain heritable property to two daughters—his only children—in liferent respectively, and to two grandchildren nominatim and other grandchildren nascituri, equally among them, share and share alike, "any of whom failing, the share or shares of the decessor or decessors to the survivors, equally among them, share and share alike in fee." Held that the fee did not vest in the testator's grandchildren or their issue at the testator's death, but that on the death of each daughter the half liferented by her fell to be divided among the testator's grandchildren or their issue then in existence, exclusively. Marshall v. King, Oct. 30, 1888, p. 40.
19. A testator directed that the fee of the residue of his estate, including certain subjects liferented by his wife (who survived him) should be held by his trustees for behoof of his children in different proportions—the sons' provisions to be payable, to the extent of £2000, twelve months after the testator's death, and the remainder twelve months after the death of his widow, the daughters' provisions to be held for their liferent alimentary use allenarly, and for the heirs of the body of each of them in fee, and failing any daughter without leaving heirs, her share to form part of the residue. The testator further directed that should any of his children die upwards of twelve months after his widow without issue, and any part of the shares of the estate in that event devolve on his sons, the trustees should pay the same to the sons as soon after the death of the persons so dying as might be convenient. It was further provided "that in case of the decease of any of my sons before receiving payment of their provisions, leaving heirs of their bodies, the provisions of such decessors, so far as unpaid to them, shall fall and devolve to the heirs of their bodies respectively, in place of their parents, and in case of the decease of any of my sons before receiving payment of their provisions, without lawful issue, then the provisions of such decessors, so far as unpaid, shall fall back into and make part of the residue of my estate divisible as aforesaid."

The widow died, her death being followed, nine years after, by that of one of the sons unmarried. On the subsequent decease of one of the daughters without issue, held that the fee of the share liferented by her did not vest until the term of payment, and that no part of it therefore belonged to the representatives of the deceased son.

Per the Lord President,—Where in a testamentary deed a fund is settled on the children of the testator for their liferent use allenarly and their children, if any, in fee, whom failing, to another person or class of persons in absolute property, if the person or persons so called are known or the individuals composing the class are ascertained at the death of the testator, the fee will vest in them a morte testatoris, subject to defeasance in whole or in part in the event of the liferenters or any of them leaving issue; if they are not so known or ascertained, the fee will not vest until the occurrence of the event which will determine who are the persons called, or until the individuals composing the class are ascertained. Steel's Trustees v. Steel, Dec. 12, 1888, p. 204.

20. A testator directed his trustees to pay the income of the residue of his estate to his sister during her life, and at her death to pay £6000 to each of his nephews whom he named. The deed then provided that "if any of my said the whole or such part of J. L.'s share as they should think fit for such time as they should deem expedient, and to pay instalments thereof to him at such times as they should see fit. In the fifth purpose he directed the residue to be divided into six shares, repeating the above directions, with this exception, that payment was to be made "so soon as my estate shall be realised." Then followed a declaration "that the foresaid provisions to my said sons" "shall not become vested interests in them until the respective terms of payment thereof." Held, on a construction of the trust-deed, that the terms of payment referred to by the testator in fixing the dates of vesting were in regard to the second purpose the death of his widow, and in regard to the fifth purpose the realisation of his estate, and that the special discretion given to the trustees to postpone payment of J. L.'s shares did not suspend vesting in his case. M'Elmail v. Lundie's Trustees, Oct. 31, 1888, p. 47.

Vesting—Direction to apportion residue within twelve months after death, or as soon thereafter as circumstances will permit—Period of payment.

23. A trustor directed his trustees to pay over the free yearly income of his estate, both heritable and moveable, to his son. As regards the residue, he directed his trustees, "in the event of my son dying without lawful descendants of his body, and within twelve months after that event, or so soon thereafter as circumstances will permit, . . . to apportion and divide the said residue among" my brother's "children equally, share and share alike, whom I hereby appoint to be my residuary legatees, . . . and it is hereby declared that the share of succession effeiring to the said residuary legatees shall become vested interests in their persons at and only upon the period of payment above mentioned." The trustor's personal estate amounted to £48,000, which was all capable of early realisation, except the stock, crop, and implements of two farms of the value of £5000. The trustor's son died without issue. J., the eldest nephew, survived him about six months, and died unmarried and intestate. At the date of his death the trustees had not apportioned and divided the residue. Held that a share of the residue had vested in J. Maclean's Trustees v. Macleans, July 19, 1889, p. 1095.

Accretion.

24. A testator directed his trustees to hold £60,000 of his estate in trust "as a special fund for the special use and behoof of the four daughters of my brother . . . the survivors and survivor of them severally and respectively in liferent." He directed that "the interest or annual income arising from said special fund . . . shall only be divided and annually paid over to the said four daughters, the survivors or survivor of them, share and share alike, for their personal maintenance and support allenarly, during their respective lives, . . . and that, subject to said liferent, . . . the said fund shall be held by my said trustees and executors for behoof of the respective child or children lawfully begotten of the said four daughters, or either of them, to the extent of their respective mother's share in said special fund in fee, and that immediately, and not burdened with a liferent to the surviving daughters, and failing child or children, to such person or persons, and in such way and manner, all as each daughter may direct and appoint by or in any writing under her hand, . . . and that either burdened or unburdened with a liferent to the surviving daughters as may be expressed in such writing." The four nieces survived the testator. The eldest died unmarried, and without having executed any deed of nomination. Another niece, A, died subsequently leaving children. In a special case held that on the death of the eldest niece the fund had been properly divided into three shares, to the liferent of one of which the surviving nieces were each entitled; and that on the death of A her children became entitled to the fee of the third which had been liferented by their mother, and that unburdened by any liferent to their surviving aunts. Strachan's Trustees v. Williamson, June 4, 1889, p. 735.

SUCCESSION—Continued.

25. A testator directed his trustees to hold the whole residue of his moveable estate "for behoof of and equally among the children" of his only child, W. C. M., "and to accumulate the interest, dividends, and annual proceeds thereof until the said children respectively attain the age of twenty-five, or, in case of daughters, until they attain that age or be married, whichever of these events shall first happen; and the shares of the accumulated principal and interest shall, in the case of sons, be paid to them on their respectively attaining to twenty-five years of age; and in the case of daughters, on their respectively attaining the said age or at marriage (if sooner), their accumulated shares shall be ascertained and set apart, and be held and applied for them respectively in liferent, for their liferent alimentary use alienarily, and their respective children in fee." There was further a clause of survivorship in the event of any son of W. C. M. dying without issue before the period of payment, but there was no such clause with reference to daughters' shares. At the date of the trustor's death, W. C. M. had two sons and four daughters, and two daughters were born after that date. The second daughter survived the trustor, but died intestate and unmarried before attaining the age of twenty-five. In a special case W. C. M. maintained that his deceased daughter's share fell to be dealt with as intestate succession either of the trustor or of herself. Held that the daughter's share had not vested in her, and fell to be divided among the other children of W. C. M. as part of the residue of the trustor's estate. Muir's Trustees v. Muir, July 12, 1889, p. 954.

Substitution in moveables—Plate and pictures.

26. A trustor directed his trustees to pay over the free yearly income of his estate, heritable and moveable, to his son. In the event of the latter dying without lawful issue, the trustees were directed to dispoise and convey the trustor's heritage, with his plate and pictures, to J., his nephew, and the lawful heirs of his body, whom failing, to G., a younger nephew, and the lawful heirs of his body. The trustor's son survived him, and died without issue, and J. survived the latter about six months, and died unmarried and intestate. Held that the plate and pictures fell to be conveyed along with the heritage to G., as substitute heir of provision. Maclean's Trustees v. Macleans, July 19, 1889, p. 1095.

Revocation—Implied Revocation.

27. A testator by his settlement bequeathed to certain nephews, including A and B, legacies of £1000 each. Thereafter he executed a codicil to this effect,—“I recall the legacy of £1000 to my nephew B . . . and I give said sum to my nephew A . . . to be paid to him at the same time with the like legacy of £1000 already given to him.” Two days later he executed this other codicil:—“I . . . renew the legacy of £1000 to my nephew B, to be paid to him as at the time of the original legacy . . . .” Held that the additional legacy of £1000 to A had not been revoked. Wright's Trustees v. Wright, May 14, 1889, p. 677.

Revocation—Ademption.

28. A testator bequeathed a legacy of “the shares standing in my name in the Paisley Gas Company.” Before the date of the will a local Act had transferred the right of supplying gas to Paisley to the corporation, substituting annuities payable to the shareholders of the Paisley Gas Company for the shares in the company, and had provided that the annuities should be conveyed or affected by any deed or will which disposed of the shares. Subsequently to the will, and before the death of the testator, these annuities had been redeemed by the corporation, and the price of the testator's annuity had been lent to the corporation on a mortgage over the gas undertaking. Held (diss. Lord Rutherford Clark) that the legacy was not adeemed, and that the legatee was entitled to the mortgage as representing the shares. Mitchell's Trustees v. Fergus, July 3, 1889, p. 902.

See Donation.

SUPERIOR AND VASSAL Personal obligation in feu-contract—Obligation on vassal, "his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever."

1. A feu-contract bore that the vassal "binds and obliges himself and his heirs, executors, and successors whomsoever" to make payment of a certain sum in name of feu-duty. The vassal having died, his heir declined to take up the feu. In an action against the vassal's executors for payment of the feu-duties which had become due since his death, and for damages for breach of contract, in failing to take up the feu on the heir declining to do so, held (1) that there was no obligation upon the executors to pay feu-duties accruing after the date of the vassal's death, and (2) that they were not liable in damages for breach of contract. Aiton v. Russell's Executors, March 19, 1889, p. 625.

Revenue—Property and Income-Tax—Casualty—Income-Tax Act, 1842, sec. 60, schedule A—Taxes Management Act, 1880, sec. 60.

2. A singular successor paid to the superior for his entry a casualty of a year's rent of the lands, without deduction of income-tax. The Crown, after receiving payment from the superior of income-tax on the casualty, assessed the vassal for income-tax on the rent. The vassal objected to the assessment, on the grounds (1) that the superior had received the whole rent for the year, and (2) that a casualty was of the same nature as feu-duty, for which deduction was allowed. The Court sustained the assessment. Macgregor v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, Feb. 8, 1889, p. 438.

3. In 1860 John Hamilton, a proprietor infeft in certain lands, and entered with the superior, disponed them a me vel de me to his brother James D. Hamilton, his heir-presumptive, who took infeftment but did not enter with the superior. On the passing of the Conveyancing Act, 1874, he was impliedly entered with the superior. John Hamilton died in 1877, and James D. Hamilton died in 1886, without having been called upon by the superior to pay a casualty. He left a general disposition and settlement in favour of William Hamilton, who was infeft thereon, and thus obtained an implied entry under the Conveyancing Act, 1874. The superior then raised an action against William Hamilton, concluding for declarator "that in consequence of the death of John Hamilton, who died upon the 27th day of February 1877, and who was vassal last seised in" the lands, "a casualty, being one year's rent of the lands, has become due to" the superior, "and that the said casualty is still unpaid, and that the full rents" after the date of citation belonged to the superior till payment of the casualty. The defender pleaded that the superior was not entitled to a casualty of composition in respect, that the defender was heir-at-law of James D. Hamilton and also of John Hamilton. Held by a majority of the whole Court (1) that by James D. Hamilton's statutory entry a new investiture was created, and the prior investiture evacuated; (2) that on the death of John Hamilton a casualty of composition became payable to the superior which could have been exacted from James; and (3) that this casualty not having been paid by James a casualty of composition was payable by the defender. Stuart v. Hamilton, July 18, 1889, p. 1030.

4. In 1764 C. and D. entered into a contract and agreement to the effect that "the said C. has sold and disponed, and binds and obliges him, his heirs and successors, to grant a feu-right to the said D., his heirs and successors," of sixty acres of land, "to be held in feu-farm and heritage of the said C., his heirs and successors, for yearly payment of £3 sterling, at the term of Martinmas yearly, . . . and to assign the rents from and after Martinmas 1765, and to free and relieve the said ground of all minister's stipend, schoolmaster's salary, cess, and all other public burdens, in all time coming, except the said feu-duty, and to make the said public a real burden upon his other lands, and also the said C. binds him and his foressaids to enclose vixt and Martinmas 1766, . . . for the which part the said D., on the said C. performing his part, granting the said feu-contract in the terms above, granting him, his heirs and successors, to content and heirs, executors, and successors whatsoever, the sum Martinmas 1765, . . . and to pay £3 of feu at the first year's payment at Martinmas 1765." The act of sasine, on which D. took infeftment in May last, successor of D., who was duly entered with the act of confirmation, which did not set forth an obligation to relieve the vassal of public burdens, raised an action in which the pursuer, who was a singular successor of C., concluding for himself that the contract of 1764 was not a feu-charter, and that the obligation to grant a feu-charter, and that the obligation to relieve the vassal of public burdens was merely a personal obligation, which was against a singular successor in the superiority. Held that the pursuer was entitled to the relief sought. Elgin, July 19, 1889, p. 1104.

A bankrupt, after his sequestration has been discharged, and no other creditor has been re-invested, the bankrupt, although not re-invested, has in himself a good title to sue for behoof of his estate. Held that the pursuer was entitled to the relief sought. Elgin, July 19, 1889, p. 1104.

A person alleged to be a debtor to the estate of a bankrupt, after his sequestration has been discharged, and no other creditor has been re-invested, the bankrupt, although not re-invested, has in himself a good title to sue for behoof of his estate. Held that the pursuer was entitled to the relief sought. Elgin, July 19, 1889, p. 1104.

A person alleged to be a debtor to the estate of a bankrupt, after his sequestration has been discharged, and no other creditor has been re-invested, the bankrupt, although not re-invested, has in himself a good title to sue for behoof of his estate. Held that the pursuer was entitled to the relief sought. Elgin, July 19, 1889, p. 1104.

Reparation—Title to sue—Parent and Child—

A bastard child has no title to sue an action of damages for the death of his father. Weir v. Coltness Iron Co., Limited, Held that the pursuer was entitled to the relief sought. Elgin, July 19, 1889, p. 1104.

Indiviso proprietors of subjects let as grass parks bond and in security thereof granted a bond and disposition of the estate. The bond contained an assignation to the creditor raised an action of mails and duties against the debtor of his debtor's share of the rents, calling as debt the other pro indiviso proprietors. The debtor, and, while admitting the debt, maintained that he was not bound to sue. The Court repelled the defences, holding that the pursuer was entitled to the relief sought. Elgin, July 19, 1889, p. 1104.

A pro indiviso proprietor of an estate let under lease has no title to sue an action of damages for the death of his father. Weir v. Coltness Iron Co., Limited, Held that the pursuer was entitled to the relief sought. Elgin, July 19, 1889, p. 1104.

Reduction.

A company brought an action against the company for the reduction of an agreement between the company and certain persons, alleging that the agreement which had been made without consulting the company was to the prejudice of himself and the other independent shareholders, that it was entered into "fraudulently and collusively," and that it would have the effect of seriously and unjustly depreciating the company's shares. There were further allegations that the agreement was ultra vires of the company. Held (rev. judgment of Lord Kinnear) that a plea of no title to sue fell to be repelled as an objection to satisfying the production, but that the pursuer was bound to call as defenders the whole parties to the agreement, and cause sisted to allow of that being done. Rixon v. Edinburgh Northern Tramways Co., March 20, 1889, p. 653.

7. Held that a judicial factor appointed on certain heritable subjects "with all the usual powers" had no title to sue a person for rents uplifted by him prior to the factor's appointment. Gordon v. Williams' Trustees, July 16, 1889, p. 980.

See Sheriff, 2.

TRUST. Investment.

1. Held that authority given by a testator to his trustees to continue investments made by him did not authorise them, on the reconstruction of an undertaking by the winding-up of an old company and the formation of a new one, to take up shares in the new company in lieu of shares belonging to the testator in the old one. Thomson's Trustees v. Thomson, Feb. 22, 1889, p. 517.

Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, secs. 67, 68, 79.

2. Lands held by testamentary trustees under a declaration that they should have no power to sell them during the lifetime of testator's children were taken by a railway company under compulsory powers and the price consigned in bank, "subject to the control and disposition of the Court of Session, to the intent that the same shall be applied, under the authority of the said Court, to some one or more of the purposes specified in the Lands Clauses Consolidation (Scotland) Act, 1845, relative to parties under disability." The Court on the petition of the trustees, while the truster's children were alive, authorised the bank to pay over the consigned money to the trustees to be invested by them in accordance with their powers under their trust-deed, without requiring them to apply it to some one or more of the purposes specified in the Act. Dickson's Trustees, Feb. 23, 1889, p. 519.

3. A testator in the second purpose of his settlement directed his trustees, on the death of his widow, to divide a certain sum into six equal shares, of which two were to be paid to two of his sons, and a third to be held by the trustees for behoof of his third son J. L. The trustees were to retain the whole or such part of J. L.'s share as they should think fit for such time as they should deem expedient, and to pay instalments thereof to him at such times as they should see fit. In the fifth purpose he directed the residue to be divided into six shares, repeating the above directions, with this exception, that payment was to be made "so soon as my estate shall be realised." Then followed a declaration "that the foresaid provisions to my said sons" "shall not become vested interests in them until the respective terms of payment thereof." Held, on a construction of the trust-deed, that the terms of payment referred to by the testator in fixing the dates of vesting were in regard to the second purpose the death of his widow, and in regard to the fifth purpose the realisation of his estate, and that the special discretion given to the trustees to postpone payment of J. L.'s shares did not suspend vesting in his case. M'Elmail v. Lundie's Trustees, Oct. 31, 1888, p. 47.

Liability of trustees' law-agent.

4. Held that it was no part of the duty of a law-agent appointed to be factor and law-agent to the trustees under a trust-disposition and settlement to volunteer his advice to the trustees that a loan made by the testator on personal security was not such an investment of the trust-funds as they were entitled to retain, and that therefore he was not liable for loss resulting from their retaining the investment. Currors v. Walker's Trustees, Jan. 25, 1889, p. 355.

Investment—Liability of trustees—Law-agent.

5. A marriage-contract empowered the trustees acting under it (two of whom were the spouses) to lend on, inter alia, heritable securities, or personal securities or obligations, and declared that the trustees should not be answerable "for errors, omissions, or neglect of diligence, nor for the insufficiency of securities, insolvency of debtors, or depreciation in the value of purchases." The greater part of the trust-funds was lent by the trustees on the security of buildings in the course of erection, the rents of which, after their completion, turned out to be insufficient to meet the interest on the loan, and the borrower became bankrupt. While both spouses were alive the children of the marriage, whose interest under the contract was during the marriage contingent merely, brought an action against the trustees and the law-agent to the trust concluding to have them ordained, "conjunctly and severally, or severally, or in such other way or manner as should seem just," to restore the money to the trust. The law-agent and one of the trustees lodged defences. It appeared from a proof that the buildings, which were in Glasgow, were of the nature of a speculation in the particular locality, and that the speculation wholly failed. The proposal for the loan was (along with others) placed before the trustees at a meeting where the spouses were present, and with it a valuation by an architect which had been obtained by the borrower. This valuation shewed an ample margin on the estimated value of the buildings when completed. The trustees obtained no separate valuation, nor did their law-agent suggest the propriety of obtaining one. The loan was agreed to at the meetings at which it was placed before the trustees.

Held (aff. judgment of the Second Division and consulted Judges), that the pursuers had no title to sue the law-agent, because he had not been employed by them.

Held (rev. judgment of Second Division and consulted Judges), that the trustee, in making the investment, had failed to shew the reasonable care that a man of ordinary prudence would exercise in the management of his own business, and therefore that he was liable personally for the trust-funds so invested, the clause of immunity affording no protection for such negligence. Raes v. Meek, August 8, 1889, H. L., p. 31.

Liability of trustees who have borrowed.

6. Opinions (per Lord Herschell, Lord Watson, and Lord Fitzgerald) that the fact that trustees in the exercise of an express or implied power have borrowed money for trust purposes on the security of the trust-estate does not necessarily involve personal liability in the event of loss resulting to the estate from the transaction, their liability depending on whether the transaction was a prudent one in the circumstances. Binnie v. Binnie's Trustees, August 8, 1889, H. L., p. 23.

Trust for creditors. See Bankruptcy, 19.

VALUATION ACTS. Value—Spinning-mill temporarily silent.

1. The proprietor of a weaving factory kept a spinning-mill, which formed part of the factory, standing from reasons of temporary expediency, and made no attempt to obtain a return from the mill by letting it, or otherwise. Held that it was properly entered in the Valuation-roll by the Assessor at its full yearly value as a going mill. Fraser & Sons v. Assessor for Burgh of Arbroath, June 14, 1889, p. 796.

Value—Consideration other than the rent—Obligation to erect a wooden circus removable by tenant.

2. A lease of a plot of ground at a fixed rent contained an obligation on the tenant, within two months of his entry, to erect and complete a wooden circus upon the ground. The tenant was further to be entitled to remove his buildings at the termination of his lease, but he was bound to leave the site clear and free from all rubbish and débris. Held that the obligation to erect the circus was not a "consideration other than the rent" within the meaning of the 6th section of the Lands Valuation Act, 1854. Martin v. Assessor for Burgh of Leith, June 14, 1889, p. 799.

Value—Principle of valuation—Cemetery.

3. A cemetery company bought land which they laid out as a burial-ground. They derived an annual income from giving off lots for burial purposes, the right of the allottees being one of perpetual use. Held that the valuation of the land ought to be based upon the rent at which in its actual state it might be expected to let to a tenant to be used by him as it had been used by the company, and not at its agricultural value. Craigton Cemetery Co., Limited, v. Assessor for Lower Ward of Lanarkshire, June 14, 1889, p. 802.

Value—Lease—Voluntary reduction of rent.

4. A landlord is not entitled to have a farm entered in the Valuation-roll at a lower rent than that stipulated for on the ground that he has granted a reduction of the rent, unless he can produce conclusive evidence to shew that he has bound himself to grant the reduction. Menzies v. Assessor for County of Perth, June 19, 1889, p. 805.

Whether valuation by burgh or by railway assessor—Unfinished railway—Lands Valuation Act, 1854, secs. 3, 20, and 21.

5. A plot of ground lying within a burgh had been acquired by a railway company, whose Act of Parliament provided that the lands from time to time acquired by the company should, "for all purposes of tolls, rates and charges, and for all purposes whatsoever, be the undertaking, railway works, and property of the company." Part of the ground had been used in the construction of a railway embankment, the remainder being covered with the débris caused by the formation of the embankment. Held that, as the ground formed part of the undertaking of a railway company within the meaning of sections 20 and 21 of the Lands Valuation Act, 1854, the burgh assessor had no duty in regard to it. Forth Bridge Railway Co. v. Assessor for Burgh of Queensferry, June 14, 1889, p. 797.

Remit to obtain further information—Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1879 (42 and 43 Vict. c. 42), sec. 9.

6. The power conferred upon the Court by section 9 of the Valuation of Lands (Scotland) Amendment Act, 1879, to remit a case, for further information, to the Commissioners or Magistrates by whom it has been stated, is limited to such matters as a mistake committed in the statement of the case, the setting forth specific details of matters stated generally, or the correction of a judgment of the Valuation Committee refusing to allow competent, or admitting incompetent, evidence.

An appellant in a valuation appeal moved the Court, in terms of the 9th section of the above Act, to remit the case to the Valuation Committee to take further evidence. Information of the facts which he desired to prove was in his possession when the case came before the Commissioners, and he failed to lead evidence thereof, or to move for an adjournment of the case to another diet to enable him to prove them. The Court refused the motion. Assessor for County of Argyll v. Marquis of Breadalbane, June 14, 1889, p. 793.

WRIT. Testament—Deletions—Marginal additions.

1. Per Lord M'Laren, Ordinary,—(1) If a will or codicil is found with the signature cancelled, or lines drawn through the dispositive or other essential clause of the instrument, then on proof that the cancellation was done by the testator himself, or by his order, with the intention of revoking the will, the will is to be held as revoked; otherwise it is to be treated as a subsisting will. (2) If a will or codicil is found with one or more of the legacies or particular provisions scored out, that raises no case for inquiry as to the testator's intention to revoke the instrument in whole; a question is raised only as to his intention to revoke the particular provision, which will not be held to have been revoked unless upon evidence that the scoring was done by the testator himself or by his direction with the intention of revoking the clause, and the authentication of the deletion by the testator's initials is sufficient evidence of such intention. (3) Marginal or interlineal additions, apparently in the testator's handwriting, will not be held part of the instrument unless authenticated by his signature or initials, for until such authentication he cannot be supposed to have finally resolved to make the addition. (4) When a will or codicil contains words scored out and others inserted in their place the cancellation is conditional on the substituted words taking effect, so that if the substituted words are rejected for want of authentication the will is to be read as if there had been no deletion. Pattison's Trustees v. University of Edinburgh, Nov. 9, 1888, p. 73.

A widow brought an action of reduction of her antenuptial marriage-contract against her husband's trustees on the ground that the notary-public who executed the deed on her behalf, she being unable to write, was at the time acting as her husband's law-agent in the matter. Held that, assuming that the execution of the deed was invalid, the marriage, which took place on the faith of the contract, validated the deed rei interventu. Question, whether the execution was invalid. Lang v. Lang's Trustees, March 15, 1889, p. 590.

A father, at the request of his son, signed and delivered to him to be filled up a blank paper stamped with a sixpenny stamp. The son filled in above the signature the words:—"Messrs A and B,—I hereby guarantee payment of £500 by my son J. H., and the payment of the premiums of insurance on his policies . . . assigned to your firm." The son, a few days afterwards, assigned the policies by assignation ex facie absolute to the creditor to whom the guarantee was to be delivered. The £500 was paid, but the father, on being informed of the obligation to pay the premiums, repudiated liability. In an action raised against the father by the creditor to enforce the obligation for payment of the premiums, held that as the document founded on was not tested or holograph the onus lay upon the pursuer to prove that the defender had authorised the obligation to pay the premiums to be inserted above his signature, and that the pursuer had failed to prove such authority. Wylie & Lochhead, Limited, v. Hornsby, July 3, 1889, p. 907.
